I would prefer not to participate in the exposition in Brazil without we can participate in a dignified manner and have an exhibit such as would be a credit to the United States. [Applause.] When Brazil appropriated $600,000 the economic conditions of the world were entirely different than they are at present. One dollar went as far then as two dollars go now. And what can be done with the money we are appropriating is less than if at that time we had appropriated $500,000 for the Brazil Exposition.
Now, the South American Republics have a friendly feeling for the United States. They look to us as big brothers, to set examples of what shall be done. They want to be friendly with us and we want to be friendly with them. There is a wonderful field for business development for this country in South America, if we treat the South American Republics as they have treated us and as they are treating us.
I sincerely hope the amendment to reduce the amount to $500,000 will not prevail, and that the original amount included in the bill for a million dollars will be the sum appropriated.
Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the text of the bill provides, not for an appropriation, but for the authorization of $1,000,000. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment to cut down the authorization to $500,000. This question was discussed by the committee. We knew in a general way that $1,000,000 would be a proper authorization. The question of taking testimony as to the expense of the building, the expense of transportation, and everything else came up, and we decided that that was properly a matter for the Appropriations Committee to investigate when they undertook to determine whether there should be $100,000, or $500,000, or $1,000,000.
Now, the industrious gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] can go before his committee—I understand he is a very influential member of it—and they can thrash that matter out, and I am perfectly sure that not one single dollar will be appropriated that is not absolutely necessary. We are all in favor of economy.
Now, I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that in his suggestion that there is a possible $10,000 for social functions, he is badly mistaken. This bill does not authorize one single dollar for social functions; and if there is any money appropriated for that purpose it is not going to come from the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, but must come from the Committee on Appropriations when they undertake to fix the appropriation.
Mr. LANHAM. And is it not also a fact that the resolution in terms provides that every expenditure that is made of this sum must receive the approval of the Secretary of State?
Mr. WINGO. Yes; and that makes me refer to one thing that I hate to see—and it does not come from the Democratic side, but it comes from the Republican side—namely, a distrust of the present Secretary of State. In justice to him, I want to say that I am advised that he wanted this bill so drawn and hedged about—and he is going to see to it—that every dollar that is expended for this exposition is expended in a proper, practical manner, and that there would not be any of these frills that have characterized expenditures heretofore. I would be willing to trust the Secretary of State with a blanket expenditure, except, as a general proposition, I am in favor of the restrictions we have placed in the bill, and for that reason I suggested the restrictions in the House committee.
I do not know where the gentleman from Minnesota got his information. Possibly he was relying on the opinion of a commercial attaché. As a practical man, I recognize that in going down to make an exhibit at the exposition such as this with a great nation, with freight charges, packing, and so forth, you can not do it for less than $1,000,000. But the Appropriations Committee can know for what it can be done, and they can hold it down to a proper sum.
I am like the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] in that I do not want the commission from the United States to go down there like a peanut merchant, with a small and contemptible exhibit, owing to the penurious position of the American Congress. It should be such an exhibit as would do credit to the greatest country on earth. I voted for the exhibit at Plymouth Rock, and that provided for $400,000 to be spent publicly and privately, and I want to say that while that was a local home affair we are all interested in Plymouth Rock from the standpoint of the whole Nation.
But I say there is equally a sentimental interest to the man who knows the history of America, the man who appreciates the potency of the Monroe doctrine. And there is something more than sentiment back of treating Brazil with consideration. Oh, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asks, "Is the expenditure of $1,000,000 the measure of their friendship?"

No. But, gentlemen, I ask you, is the appropriation of so many dollars the measure of our courtesy, of our respect for ourselves, of our appreciation of the amenities that should obtain between sister nations on the American Continent?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. I say I do not want, when I vote upon this proposition, to put the American Congress in the attitude of saying that we measure these things by dollars and cents. It is not a question of what Brazil measures, but of what we do. If we vote down this authorization of $1,000,000 and say, "We will have a second-rate exhibit down there," we will say that "America, great and powerful as she is, assuming the right under the Monroe doctrine to dominate the Western Continent, the American Hemisphere, measures Brazil in that way." She will measure our courtesy and our friendly relations by the action we take in comparison with her course in spending $3,000,000 in America, when we propose to expend only $500,000 instead of a million, which would be necessary to make a proper exhibit.

The gentleman spoke of the $17,500 to be paid to the commissioner. There is nothing in this bill that will permit Secretary Hughes to pay $17,500 to one man. You are going to have two honorary commissioners, and they——

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not say so.

Mr. WINGO. I do not accuse the gentleman from Wisconsin. He is generally accurate in his statements, but the tempestuous gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] got confused and said it will be $17,500. [Laughter.] Two of these commissioners are to be honorary commissioners, who will be able to defray their expenses from their own private purses. The expenditures to be made under the authorizations of this resolution will be made altogether for necessary expenses, and such necessary expense as every man of good, common sense knows must be paid. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am sure there is no difference of opinion as to the desirability of accepting the invitation that has come to us from our sister Republic. The only question that has arisen here, so far as I have discovered from the debate, has to do with the amount of the expenditures that will be incurred in connection with our acceptance of that invitation.

I wish to call your attention to the fact that the invitation has gone out from Brazil to other countries as well as to our own, and that it has been accepted already by several of them. The international exposition in Brazil will be comparable with ours of 1876. It will be to celebrate the one-hundredth anniversary of the independence of a great nation. The nations of the world will be assembled there. We certainly do not wish to make a poor showing in comparison with others. That may be a purely selfish point of view, but a certain enlightened selfishness is, after all, not a bad thing to have.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; briefly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the other participants act wisely and we act wisely, ought we not to have the best exhibit of any of the nations there?

Mr. TEMPLE. I think our nearness to Brazil and our standing among the nations of the world would make it very fitting if our exhibit would be the best of all those taken there by foreign countries.

I think also that courtesy demands an entirely sufficient appropriation. So far as the effect to be produced upon our neighbors is concerned, I am sure they will be appreciative if we show to them the courtesy they have always shown to us. If there should be any failure on our part it would be a sad thing for our own self-respect, to say nothing of the impression upon neighbors kindly disposed to us.

It has not always been true that the Republics of South America were kindly disposed toward the United States, the giant of the north, as we have sometimes been called in their publications. But I am very happy to notice that of late years and even of late months there are evidences of an increasing good will. I suppose I may be at liberty to mention a recent postal treaty, which has a very considerable bearing upon our commercial relations as well, particularly in its provisions in regard to the parcel post, the carrying of packages between North America and South America. The preamble of this treaty specifically recites, as one of its purposes, a desire to promote that solidarity of action among the Republics of the Western Hemisphere which our common interests in the transportation of the mails demand. I think it is the first time in any treaty between American Republics that a purpose to act together, to recognize the common interests, and to seek an increased solidarity of action has ever been mentioned. I should regret very much if there should be the slightest shadow upon our courtesy at the present time.

I wish barely to mention one other consideration. The value of the dollar has decreased so much in recent years that I do not believe an appropriation of less than that suggested in the bill—$1,000,000—will make such a showing as has been made hitherto by much smaller appropriations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I do not want the five minutes. The gentleman can have the time if he wants it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I modify it and make it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana prefers an additional unanimous-consent request, that the time within which the debate shall be limited shall be 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote in Committee of the Whole for the $500,000. Not because I favor that amount, but because it is the smaller amount. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I happen to know that when you vote for an appropriation in a bill for $500,000 the plans are going to be made and the cloth is going to be cut accordingly, and plans of that sort will be submitted to us in such form that it will be most difficult to cut it down, because if you vote for a $1,000,000 proposition, you will never have an opportunity in the Committee on Appropriations to get the $500,000 plan at all.

But I did not expect anything else. I knew, when my Republican friends were going around all over this country during the last campaign preaching economy on every stump, that you could not practice it. You don't know how. You will never be able to economize in your lives. It is not in the power of the Republican Party to economize. You talk about economy, but you never practice it. It takes a little self-denial for a man to economize as an individual. You will find a few individual Members on the Republican side who desire and who may practice individual economy and who would like to see to it that we exercise it here. They are, however, in a hopeless minority on the Republican side. We should remember that we owe $25,000,000,000.

The interest on the public debt is over $1,000,000,000 every year. We should endeavor to cut down everywhere, and the wise and good thing for this great Republic to do is to say to the people down in Brazil and throughout the world, "We will be just before we are generous. We can not show our appreciation of you at this time by giving you an appropriation for an exposition."

You can not buy a man's friendship, and you are not going to buy Brazil's trade. The only way you are going to get Brazil's trade is to trade with Brazil, and the only way to trade with Brazil is to be able to get such trade relations and tariff arrangements that the Brazilians can sell us something.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman believe in the principle that friendship may have its effect in business relations, or does he not?

Mr. SISSON. I do; but I also believe that if you wish to sell to a man you ought also to fix it so that you can buy something from him. That is the best way I know to encourage trade relations with a man or with a country. Now, I love my friend from Indiana and he is a good friend, but I wish to suggest to him that the way to gain the friendship of a nation is always to be just and fair with her. I think $500,000 for an unconstitutional purpose—pardon me for the allusion—is ample, and if you people meant what you said to the American people last fall you have here an opportunity to save $500,000 and do no man any harm.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does the gentleman mean to say that he will vote for an appropriation of $500,000 for this purpose?

Mr. SISSON. I will not. I never have and I never will vote for it. I never voted for one of these expositions in my life and never expect to.

Mr. TEMPLE. I misunderstood the gentleman then. I thought he said about three minutes ago that he would vote for $500,000.

Mr. SISSON. Then the gentleman certainly misunderstood me, because I never have and never will. I believe it is a miserable lot of monkeyshines and monkey shows that never made $10 worth of trade for anybody. I am endeavoring to save something here, but I know the die is cast. I want to help my Republican friends over here, some of whom I know to be real economists. I know some of them would be glad to vote for the $500,000, but they have even got to bunco the American people on the question of economy, because the die is cast, the bosses have spoken, and you must stand by the edict of those higher up.

Mr. CURRY. I would like the gentleman from Mississippi to tell me how much tariff there is levied on the coffee that is grown in Brazil, of which the United States is the greatest consumer?

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman can not get me off into a tariff discussion while I am discussing this particular question. [Laughter.] Bless your heart, if we started discussing the tariff we would never get back to this, and that has got absolutely nothing on earth to do with this proposition. The gentleman is off on a side issue. I have said nothing about trade except to tell you that I do not believe these expositions have any effect in promoting trade.

Mr. CURRY. Is there any tariff laid on anything that Brazil wishes to sell to us?

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman feels about coffee as I do, he will have his coffee at any price, no matter how much it costs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I understand the attitude of my genial friend from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], who has just taken his seat, is that he is against any appropriation, but he says, "If you must unwisely vote for an appropriation, then vote for the size of an appropriation that I suggest." Now, let us take our advice on this matter from the friends and not from the opponents of the measure.

I have listened with a good deal of interest to the earnest efforts that have been made by certain gentlemen to convince us that a proper showing could be made at Rio de Janeiro for $500,000. I sympathize very largely with their attitude, and if I felt quite certain that we could beyond all question make a showing at Rio de Janeiro which would be proper under the circumstances for the smaller amount I would be inclined to vote for it. But gentlemen should remember that the Committee on Appropriations will have something to say about this matter before one single dollar is appropriated. So far as the evidence now before us is concerned I am not convinced that we can make a proper exhibit at Rio de Janeiro for less than approximately the sum named in the bill. If the Committee on Appropriations find they can somewhat reduce the amount, all well and good. While we are all for economy, there are some proposals with regard to which we can not afford to indulge in dangerous cheeseparing. Among those matters are those things that have to do with our intercourse and relationships, political, economical, and industrial, with the great nations of the world. Brazil is a great and friendly Republic. She is proposing to show the world the fruits of her progress and development. She invites us to her exhibition. We, the greatest people on this continent, the neighbor and friend of Brazil—shall we be niggardly in responding to her kindly invitation? After all, in these days $1,000,000 is not so great a sum, and before the next session of Congress closes we will have many opportunities to save not one but many millions, and when that time comes we shall invoke the aid and assistance of gentlemen who are now, I think, unwisely urging too much economy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were 22 ayes and 94 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress within six months of the close of said exposition a detailed statement of the expenditures which may have been incurred under the provisions of the resolution, together with all reports called for under sections 5, 6, and 7 of this resolution, which reports shall be prepared and arranged with a view to concise statement and convenient reference.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, is a motion in order to move to strike out a part of the last section read?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I just want to say that I most heartily indorse the unanimous recommendation of this committee. I am in favor of the proposed legislation. The House should pass it for the general good that will come to the United States from this participation in the international centennial celebration at Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this merely to show that every member of the California delegation has spoken in favor of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. It is to show the good judgment of the Representatives from California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANHAM. I understand that the measure not having been amended in that particular the preamble will be included.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am informed that goes in. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that as amended it do pass.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, the committee rose and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HUSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had under consideration Senate joint resolution 114 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to recommit Senate joint resolution 114 to the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out, in line 19, page 8, the figures "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not in order, because the House has just adopted as one amendment the entire amendment proposed by the committee, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would modify that amendment, which could only be done by a reconsideration and is improper as a motion to recommit under the precedents.

Mr. Speaker, there are two precedents I noted in the short examination of the question which I made. On February 6, 1913, in the third session of the Sixty-second Congress, and on May 22, 1912, at page 6974. The Manual and Digest, section 957, discusses that question at length. That section sets out in full the ruling made by Speaker Clark on May 22, 1912:

A motion to recommit with instructions to eliminate an amendment adopted by the House is not in order.

The discussion there reviews a number of decisions, and, by the way, there are more recent decisions which I have not turned to, which present the same question, and the Chair reached the same decision. The reason for the rule is that the House, having adopted the amendment, that question can only be reached by reconsideration of the amendment. Suppose the House had considered the bill in the House instead of in the Committee of the Whole. Once the amendment is adopted by the House, we have passed the matter, and the only way to deal with it is a motion to consider. A motion to recommit, which undertakes to change an amendment which has just been adopted by the House, is an attempt in an indirect way to do what the House could not do directly. The decisions are so clearly in point that I shall not further discuss them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am quite well acquainted with the rule and the citation made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. The special rule under which this resolution is being considered provides for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 114. It does not provide, as is sometimes the practice, to consider a Senate joint resolution as amended by the committee. In Committee of the Whole there was a unanimous-consent agreement entered into whereby the House amendment would be considered as an original proposition and considered section by section. It is true that that agreement has not been reported by the chairman of the committee to the House. The fact is that this bill, in consideration in Committee of the Whole, was considered as an original proposition section by section, not as one amendment. That was the agreement with the gentleman from Indiana. If it is an original proposition and was considered in Committee of the Whole as such and the bill is reported back as an original proposition, then I maintain that I am within my rights in offering a motion to recommit of the nature submitted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the original ruling was made, I think, by Mr. Speaker Clark to the effect that, the House having voted on an amendment, it was not in order in a motion to recommit with instructions to strike out or eliminate that amendment. That ruling has been held, but I do not recall any ruling which went to the effect that the House, having voted upon an amendment, that amendment could not be further amended or perfected by a motion to recommit. In fact, I think there is one precedent in Hinds to the effect that after the previous question has been ordered a motion to recommit can strike out a portion of an amendment already agreed to by the House, and it would seem that this comes within that class of cases. If the gentleman from Wisconsin had moved to strike out the amendment which had already been agreed to, it clearly would come within the ruling made by former Speaker Clark, but he has only struck out a portion of it, and substituted other matter, further amending or perfecting it. I know of no ruling which would restrain the House from doing that under a motion to recommit.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the decisions in cases of this kind, I think, have been very clear. The House adopted an amendment making an appropriation of $1,000,000. That matter was discussed in the committee. An amendment was agreed to in the committee. The House has adopted that amendment. The House has passed on the matter. There should be no ruling which would deprive the House of an opportunity one way or the other to pass on a question such as this, but the House has had its opportunity to pass upon the question, when the question before the House was that of agreeing to the amendment, and the amendment contained among other things an authorization of $1,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Following out the gentleman's line of reasoning, would he contend that a separate motion to recommit would not be in order because the House had already agreed to this amendment, and therefore we could not recommit without instructions?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not called upon to answer that question.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think there is no question but that a general motion to recommit is in order, because that is a motion to recommit the bill. This is not in order, because it is a violation of a very fundamental principle that you can not do by indirection what you can not do directly under the House rule.

Mr. MONDELL. And furthermore the House had ample opportunity to pass on this very question and has passed on it—not the committee but the House. The gentleman now desires to have the House pass on it the second time through a motion to recommit, and that is clearly contrary to the rules.

Mr. WINGO. If the Chair will hear me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. While I am against the motion to recommit, I can not agree with the proposition that the motion is not in order. I am aware of the fact that there are precedents which I disagree with, and have argued before to the Chair, but I submit to the Speaker never has any Speaker, either Speaker Clark or the present Speaker, gone to the extent it is argued we should go by those who present this point of order. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says the House has had a chance to pass on this. The House has not, I respectfully submit. In the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union a proposition was offered to the committee whether or not there would be a million dollars or $500,000. The Senate bill carried a million dollars. The House committee amendment carried a million dollars, so there has not been any issue in the House on that. While I am opposed to this proposition, and opposed in the committee an amendment of $500,000, I do not want the ruling on this question to further limit the right of a motion to recommit. I think already the precedents have gone too far, because the Speaker remembers it was very clearly stated by Mr. Speaker Clark at one time that the prime purpose of a motion to recommit is to give the opposition a right to have a clear-cut record vote in presenting its theory of the pending proposal, and if we go this far, and I think we have already gone too far, then you rob the minority of having a clear-cut motion to recommit and present its theory of the pending proposal and get a roll call on that.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I do.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman take the position that the House has not had an opportunity to act on this proposition?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. In view of the fact the committee struck out the Senate bill after the enacting clause and an amendment which included $1,000,000 and the committee accepted the amendment when the House acted upon that after we went out of the Committee of the Whole into the House just a moment ago, the House had acted upon the committee amendment and had the opportunity which the gentleman says is denied.

Mr. WINGO. On the committee amendment—was there a dispute over the million dollars?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The whole bill.

Mr. WINGO. The whole proposition of the House amendment was what; that merely for the sake of convenience we embodied our disagreements to the Senate bill in one amendment? Was there a disagreement with the Senate on the million dollars? No. And when the House passed upon it and substituted the amendment of the committee for the Senate text they were not settling a dispute between a million and $500,000, but upon other propositions. And so in one of the most material things in the bill if you do not give the minority—I am not talking of political minority, although that is the prime purpose of the motion to recommit rule—if you do not give them the right by a motion to recommit, to present by record vote their position upon the question, you further limit the motion to recommit and that is the consideration that moves me to take the position I do in this matter.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, and even if the House in passing upon this amendment had voted the amendment down and restored the original language the same condition would have been left?

Mr. WINGO. I am glad the gentleman called attention to that. The precedents are these, that where the House has voted up and after it has once voted and accepted a pending proposition then you can not, by motion to recommit, change that which is voted up, but never has it been ruled that when you have voted a proposition down in the Committee of the Whole House that the minority can not present that same identical proposition in a motion to recommit, and while I am against the motion to recommit and do not want to see it carried, I can not remain silent, but take the position I do. This motion does not cover the identical question decided by the House when it accepted the committee amendment, but affects only one provision which was identical with the Senate provision; so the House has never voted on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair thinks there is much force in the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that a motion to recommit is intended to give the minority—not the political minority, but a minority of the Members—an opportunity to express itself. But there are a number of predicaments that arise where that can not be done. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] has clearly expressed it in saying that we can not do indirectly what we can not do directly. A proposed amendment must be amended, if at all, before it is adopted and not after it has been adopted. Therefore, it can not be amended in a motion to recommit. The Chair thinks the motion to recommit is not in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move the following amendment:

Line 18, page 8, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$500,000."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the previous question was not ordered. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD offers the following amendment: Page 8, line 19, by striking out "$1,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500,000."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move, as an amendment to the gentleman's motion, the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that now. The question is on the previous question on the amendment as moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 113.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the vote just taken in that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is clear there is no quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 74, nays 181, answered "present" 3, not voting 173, as follows:

YEAS—74.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Roscommon, Lyon Manor, Markey, Mason, and Ingham County, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the limitation of armaments, the payment of the foreign debt, and a reduction of governmental expenditures, so as to decrease taxation, which were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Study Club of Ypsilanti, Mich., favoring sessions of the conference on limitation of armaments open to public knowledge and criticism and the chief business of such conference to be the limitation of armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Adrian, Mich., praying for a reduction in freight rates so as to help revive business, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 25th instant they had presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 71) for the consolidation of the offices of register and receiver in district land offices in certain cases, and for other purposes.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. At the request of the Committee on the District of Columbia I ask that the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 128) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the ceremonies attending the international conference for the limitation of armament, which was referred to that committee, may be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I also ask that the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the citizens' committee of the District of Columbia in connection with the ceremonies attending the international conference for the limitation of armament, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, may be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 162) was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the United States Government is at peace with Germany and her allies; and
Whereas many persons are now serving sentences in the Federal prisons of this country for alleged violations of the espionage act, one of the war laws enacted by the American Congress during the late war; and

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The Secretary will report the pending amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The READING CLERK. The pending amendment to the amendment is on page 131, after line 3, where it is proposed by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to insert:

For the calendar year 1922 and for each calendar year thereafter excess-profit taxes shall be levied as follows:

Twenty per cent of the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 50 per cent of the invested capital and 40 per cent of the excess over 50 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, it is argued that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri and that an excess-profits tax is contrary to the principles announced by the Democratic Party at its convention in San Francisco. That platform declares that—

We advocate a tax reform and a searching revision of war revenue acts to fit peace conditions, so that the wealth of the Nation may not be withdrawn from productive enterprise or diverted to wasteful or nonproductive expenditure.

It requires the almost morbid ingenuity and the florid and exuberant fancy of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to conceive of any possible analogy between the pronouncement of the Democratic platform and his position. There is nothing in this platform that by the most strained construction can be twisted, much less interpreted, into a lack of accord with the amendment introduced by the Senator from Missouri. Will it be said that a tax upon profits in excess of 15 per cent will drive business paying such profits into nonproductive or wasteful enterprises?

Will any man who has sense enough to come in out of the rain, much less an astute business man making in excess of 15 per cent, demolish his business, abandon it, and invest his hitherto productive millions in an unproductive business or in some wasteful expenditure? There is no earthly connection between a system of taxation that will force legitimate business into nonproductive enterprise or wasteful expenditures and a tax upon profits in excess of 15 per cent.

Mr. President, we are necessarily imposing heavy taxes at this time even upon nonproductive business. There are thousands and tens of thousands of men to-day who are forced to do business at a loss in order to do business at all who nevertheless bear a heavy burden of taxation. This country is full of carriers who are doing business at a loss in order to avoid the greater loss which would result from going into the hands of receivers or from an utter abandonment of their business. There are thousands and tens of thousands of men to-day who are engaged in the mining of coal and other minerals who are carrying on that business at a loss in order to avoid a greater loss incident to the closing down or the flooding of those mines and the scattering of their employees.

It is true that much of this tax upon unproductive property at this time is in the way of State rather than of Federal taxation, but it is nevertheless true that the mines of the country in many instances to-day are paying taxes upon millions of dollars of valuation where there is not 1 per cent of return. It is true that from the Atlantic to the Pacific there are millions and tens of millions of acres of fertile land that are being tilled by patient toilers who delve from sunrise until dark, working 12 and 14 hours a day, to find at the end of the year's hard work that their agricultural products, their corn, their wheat, their grain, and their live stock will not bring enough to pay the actual cost of production; and yet there is not a head of that stock, there is not an acre of that land, that is exempted from taxation because the business is unproductive.

However, in spite of that condition, and in the face of that condition, we are told here that the Democratic platform condemns an excess-profits tax, and that to levy a tax upon profits at this time in excess of 15 per cent, to levy any kind of an excess-profits tax, will be contrary to the principles of the Democratic platform and will result in the destruction of the business or in driving men into unproductive enterprises. A man who would quit a business that was paying from 15 to 500 per cent because he would have to pay a tax upon profits in excess of 15 per cent and place his capital in unproductive or wasteful enterprises ought to be taken by the nearest magistrate, brought into the nearest court, and tried under an inquirendo as utterly incapable of attending to any business. Such a contention is an absurdity on its face.

This man of straw is more ridiculous than the scarecrow made of an old shirt, a pair of trousers, and a straw hat and hung up in a cornfield. No man with sense enough to tell the difference between that sort of an effigy and a human being will ever be frightened by the scarecrow so eloquently portrayed by the gifted Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. President, we are told upon the other side of the Chamber that there is no dread of going before the people of America, before the electorate of the United States, with this absurd proposition, because, forsooth, for 40 years that organization has governed the destinies of America. Do the gentlemen forget that huge majorities are not a guaranty of a perennial hold upon power? I saw their party come in with a great majority in 1908, serene and insolent as now in their power, in their expectation of a continued and uninterrupted régime for years to come, and yet within four years I saw that same organization in its blindness and fatuity carry but two States in this Union. It is true that they were destined to live to win another victory, but the defeats of the past should at least teach this Bourbon oligarchy that history may repeat itself, should at least warn them that a victory, however sweeping, is no guaranty against the outraged common sense and the outraged conscience of the American people.

Mr. President, I defy even the gifted Senator from Indiana, with his audacity and eloquence, to defend this abominable thing before the ex-service men of the United States. You destroy $400,000,000 of revenue and then claim you have no funds and can find no means for securing the payment of a solemnly promised compensation. I pity even him when he attempts to tell the 5,000,000 idle men, hungry and ragged, that we dare not take any part of the burden from their nakedness and from their hunger and impose that burden upon those who now are making from 15 to 500 per cent for fear that they will close more doors, dismantle more factories, and, in revenge, deliberately squander their money in unproductive or in wasteful enterprises in order to have the fiendish delight of inflicting misery upon their fellow men because, forsooth, a few insurgent Republicans and a multitude of intelligent Democrats got together and prevented this abomination.

Mr. President, where will you place this tax if not upon excess profits? Will you follow the example and the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury? Will you place it upon the stamps upon our letters? Will you place it upon deeds and mortgages? Will you place it upon the necessities of life? Will you place it upon everything that is worn or eaten or used by the vast multitude of the people? Has it come to this, that in order to induce big business to continue to function, it must be exempted from taxation at a time when you refuse to exempt the very lifeblood and the necessities of the great masses of the American people?

If an excess-profits tax was justifiable in time of war, if it was justifiable, Mr. President, in time of profound prosperity, if it was justified when work was hunting the man and when unemployment was comparatively unknown, when poverty was a stranger, when business and plenty and hope filled a smiling land, when the agriculturist was prosperous, when the laborer was prosperous, when the carrier was prosperous, when every avenue of American industry teemed with activity and with hope—if at a time like that a tax upon unearned and enormous profits was justifiable, how will you justify relieving from taxation the only men who have the means to pay for fear they may cease to plunder the American people?

Will you do it by a perversion of that doctrine, "Unto him that hath shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath"?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will my friend allow me to remind him that when Charles Dickens visited this country, when the Government had been for many years in the power of what was called the "House of Virginia," he wrote back to England that he had never seen an unemployed man, and that a beggar on the streets of Boston, or any other great American city, would excite as much wonder as a flaming sword let down from heaven.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Georgia, concerning the visit of Charles Dickens, in what year it occurred? I know approximately, but have forgotten the exact date.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not at this moment recall the exact year; but it was when the House of Virginia, as it was called derisively, Democrats all of them, had defeated the Adamses of New England and were in power and had been in power under Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and then again under Jackson, who, as the Senator knows, paid off the public debt.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I was going to remark that this exquisite genius and keen observer was reviewing a country that for generations had been under Democratic control and administration.

The argument that either the Democratic or the Republican Party has made this country rich, Mr. President, is food for fools. If uttered in another place and by another than the gifted Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], it might be said that it was the practice of demagogues to catch dupes, pringles to catch woodcocks. Any government that would dare, by means of taxation, to take property from all the people for the purpose of fostering the enterprises of a few of the people, would be a dishonest government as well as a foolish government. The purpose of government is not to make men rich; it is to make men free. It is not to insure an excessive income to any particular business, but to give every business an equal opportunity in the race for life. As the eloquent Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] said on yesterday, this country is great and rich and powerful not on account of the wisdom of the Democratic Party, not on account of the blunders of the Republican Party, but by the grace of God and by virtue of the energy of the most tireless and capable people who ever tilled a field or opened a mine or sent an engine whirling and screaming across a continent.

This country is rich and powerful because of the teeming brains and the brawny arms and the dauntless spirits of the sons of the pioneers and of the Pilgrims, who sought, among wild beasts and wilder men, among the perils of the wilderness, freedom of conscience and freedom of action; and so long as God Almighty does not curse us with a political oligarchy that will throttle freedom of conscience, freedom of speech, and freedom of action we will go onward and upward, even beyond the present high point we have attained under Woodrow Wilson, where the American flag is saluted from the rising to the setting of the sun, from the poles to the Equator, by every lover of liberty in every civilized land on earth, as the hope and the savior of a bleeding and distracted world.

Mr. President, let the Senator from Indiana review the history of this country under a Democratic and under a Republican régime. Between 1850 and 1860 this country advanced relatively more rapidly in wealth and in population than at any other time. Take its advance from the days of Jefferson to the Civil War—from three or four million people, scattered along the Atlantic coast, to their occupation of a continent during 50 years of Democratic rule—and it was the growth in wealth of a great people. Take its advance during Republican rule, and it was the growth in wealth of great interests. It is true that the country continued to grow in power and in wealth under Republican as well as under Democratic rule, but its growth under Republican rule was an abnormal and a perverted growth. In the language of the great W. C. P. Breckenridge, of Kentucky, it was the advance of a giant, it was the flight of an eagle, but it was the advance of a giant shackled and manacled, it was the flight of an eagle, but an eagle weighed and trammeled; and there never was such a plan to weigh and trammel the American eagle, to shackle the American giant, to oppress poverty and energy and enterprise, and to foster the freebooter, the bandit, the profiteer, the lord bountiful of subservient political organizations and polluted political influences. This is a bald, unblushing attempt to reward a few multimillionaires who have it in their power to reward those who are daring enough to defy all the principles of justice and all the demands of decency in the imposition of this monstrous, this iniquitous measure, in this exemption of the only people who are able to pay without feeling it, without having it cut to the bone. This proposition to take the burden from the profiteer and place it upon the bowed back of toil, upon struggling and unremunerated enterprise, is the most astounding, the most indefensible thing that even the Republican Party has ever done in 60 years of blundering and misrule.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, our friends in control of this legislation have sought to eliminate here and there, in different places, certain taxes that exist under the present law. It is very conspicuous that it has been their object and their purpose in practically every instance, as far as there was any proposed change in the law of any consequence, to relieve the large incomes and those making excess profits from performing their duty by the Government. I felt that it was reprehensible enough for them to seek to reduce very substantially the tax imposed upon those receiving net incomes of more than $68,000 per annum. That was inexcusable, but even as indefensible as such a reduction may have been, even more indefensible and inexcusable is the effort of our Republican friends now, joined by other friends who enjoy designating themselves as the "agricultural bloc," to exempt excess profits.

Had those in charge of this legislation and those who have made compromises with them proposed some relief in the way of stamping out the nefarious practice of the profiteer by providing that he would have to cease his extortion, which borders upon a legalized robbery of the American people, then you might say that there was some excuse for removing an excess-profits tax; but in substance and in reason the action of our friends means no more or less than that they propose to let the profiteer continue to ply his trade; they propose to permit him to continue to make excess profits out of the American people, and as recompense and as reward for this conduct they say, "Oh, well, we will exempt you from any taxes upon your excess profits." That is all it means, and that is just what the American people are going to consider that it means.

The Republicans or the members of the agricultural bloc who fool themselves into the idea that the American people are going to accept their excuses for exempting excess profits from taxation are going to awaken to the fact, and that in the near future, that they have fooled themselves, and that they have not fooled or misled the American people.

If the present law imposing excess-profits taxes works unjustly and harshly in any respect, then why did not the committee and those who contend that it works certain impositions come before the Senate with a measure proposing to make modifications that would relieve any injustices or any hardships that may exist? A measure of that kind might have possessed some merit. There may be instances in the case of small businesses and small incomes, even though they reach into the class of excess profits, where there are some hardships. If that is true, the remedy should be so to modify the law as to remove those classifications, and not, in order to readjust any discrepancies or any hardships in those few minor cases, repeal the whole law and relieve the profiteers of the country from taxation.

What do you suppose the citizen with his family to support thinks when the Government says to him: "You are required to contribute a tax burden to the Government upon all of your earnings in excess of $2,500 per annum"? "Why?" "Because we need revenue;" but in the very next paragraph of the same measure imposing that burden upon him, those controlling this measure say to the profiteer: "In view of your patriotism, in view of the wonderfully commendable business sagacity that you displayed while this country was prostrate in the throes of war and made your excess profits, pyramiding and pyramiding into the teeming millions, we appreciate so much your operations that we are going to exempt you from taxation in the future."

What do you think the struggling young man or young woman, working upon a pittance of twelve or fifteen hundred dollars or eighteen hundred dollars per annum, fired with ambition to prepare themselves for the more serious duties and responsibilities of life, perchance laboring during the day and attending school at night, are going to think when you say to them: "You have got to contribute to the Government a tax upon all of your income in excess of $1,000 because we have to raise revenue, because we want you to do your duty by the Government," and in the next paragraph you write into this measure that outrageous, that indefensible and inexcusable provision removing all taxes on the profiteer on his excess profits? It is the old story of placing the dollar above the man, and that dollar in many instances is a tainted dollar, because made by exorbitant profits.

Senators, many of these profiteers, instead of being rewarded by the Congress for their nefarious conduct in the way of relief from taxation, should have a sentence to Leavenworth or to Atlanta. That would be more just retribution, instead of giving them a reward. Capital is entitled to a fair return, but no more.

During the struggle in which the Nation was recently engaged it was the pride of every patriotic American citizen to see the unanimity with which the American people in a general way came to the support of the Government in the war. Americans had always answered the call of their country to arms. Gallantly and heroically the young manhood of the Nation had always maintained themselves with honor upon the battle field. That was true in the recent conflict; but while the very flower of the land had responded to arms and had gone upon the battle fields to defend the Nation to fight the battles of the American people, we find that those who were heartless, those who were filled and dominated by greed, that were unscrupulous, were plying their trade in the way of making excessive profits from the American people.

Do you tell me that those who will avail themselves of the situation as they did during times of war, when every American citizen, instead of trying to profit by the misfortunes of his people and of his Nation, should be satisfied with reasonable profits, will not with equal diligence do the same in times of peace, if you only afford them the opportunity?

The proponents of this bill know that if they remove this tax upon excess profits they will not deter or prevent this conscienceless, mercenary class of our citizens, who made excess profits during the war, from doing it again. They know that if this country comes back into its prosperity, and money once again circulates freely, with that returning opportunity the profiteer is going to wring from the American people every dollar he can, and the only limitation upon the profits that he will charge for his goods and his wares, the only limitation upon the amount of excess profits he shall make, will be the limitation of what he can get from those with whom he has business. Yet they propose to relieve them from taxation. A large majority of the American business people are content to make reasonable returns upon their investments and labor, and yet by repealing the tax on excess profits extorted by the profiteer you propose to shift $450,000,000 of tax burden from the profiteers to the honest, fair, and patriotic citizens of our country who are willing to live and let live.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator said that we propose to relieve those who make excess profits from taxation, and he has referred to the people in this country who receive the larger incomes. Under the bill as it is now presented, we impose a 50 per cent inheritance tax, a 50 per cent surtax, a 15 per cent corporation tax, and an 8 per cent normal tax. Does the Senator think that, combining those taxes, we are relieving the people of this country from taxation to an unreasonable extent? They also have to pay local taxes, inheritance taxes, income taxes, and capital-stock taxes, and yet the Senator knows that if this bill passes there are a 103,000,000 of the American people who pay no direct taxes at all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I know that if you repeal this excess-profits tax, as far as I have been able to obtain the data, you relieve those making the excess profits of $450,000,000 per annum. That is the relief to be afforded by the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. McLEAN. But if we can do that and still meet the expenses of the Government, with all the other taxes that wealth has to pay, should we not do it, if beyond that we leave a hundred and three million of the American people to pay no taxes at all? Does the Senator think taxes are a blessing?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I say that you should relieve the American people of taxation as much as you can, but in the selection of those to whom the beneficence of the Government should be displayed in the way of tax relief I would never select those who make excess profits. I would never select the profiteers of the country as those to be relieved of an enormous amount of taxation. Why should you so favor them and impose a greater burden upon others?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did I understand the Senator from Connecticut to say there are a hundred and three million people in this country who pay no taxes?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is not a living human being in the United States old enough to earn anything at all who does not pay a large part of the taxes we impose in our revenue laws and our tariff laws. There are in this bill, from beginning to end, taxes which everybody knows are transmitted by the man who actually pays them to the man who consumes the goods that are sold, and there is not, therefore, a single human being in the country who does not bear a part of the burden of the taxes we are imposing by this bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator from North Carolina for his suggestion. I tried to impress upon the Senate the other day the fact that while 103,000,000 people pay no direct taxes, yet, as a matter of fact, these excess-profits taxes on a rising market they have paid in some instances, according to the experts, 23 per cent in consumption taxes because of this very excess-profits tax. My theory is that if we are going to tax consumption, if we are going to tax the mass of the people upon what they use, let us be frank and honest about it and let them know what taxes they are paying and not conceal it under indirect taxes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to ask the Senator a question. He says that the excess-profits tax is passed on to the consumer. I would like to ask him what relief there is afforded in this measure, or what relief does the other side propose, to bring about a cessation of the making of excess profits? What do they propose as a matter of relief against the exaction of excess profits? The only proposal they have made is to exempt excess profits from taxation. What a mockery and fallacy is such suggestion as a measure to check or deter the profiteer. You do not even propose to make him contribute a part of his excess profits to the Government. You do not propose any measure to check the profiteer but instead propose to relieve him from taxation on his excess profits.

Mr. McLEAN. I said that in a falling market it is very difficult to pass an excess-profits tax on to the consumer where there is competition. Taxes, in the final accounting, must of course be paid by goods. They are paid by goods, and we have had such a shortage of capital needed to reproduce the enormous totals of industrial capital that are consumed every year that, as a result, the surplus industrial capital required has not been in existence and a great many concerns have been driven out of business. That is the direct effect of continuing these surtaxes and other high taxes.

I want to say to the Senator from Florida that if the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber had understood this subject; if, in their anxiety to tax wealth on the one hand and consumption on the other, they had realized that in a rising market the consumer pays a large portion of the tax, they would have collected in 1917, 1918, and 1919, $3,000,000,000 more than they did when production was high, and prices were high, and it was the spirit of the people to pay taxes. If the Democratic administration had done that they would not have been compelled to issue $3,000,000,000 of short-time certificates, which have crowded liquid credits out of the banks, credits which have been sorely needed by the agricultural interests of the West in the last two years.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator says we should have collected more taxes in 1919. Who was in control of Congress that year?

Mr. McLEAN. I said 1917, 1918, and 1919.

Mr. REED. Who was in control in 1918 and 1919 but the gentleman's own party?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the gentleman has his dates wrong.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Florida yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Has the Senator from Connecticut finished?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; I have finished for the present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator from Missouri insists upon his point, I will call his attention to the fact that we came into power on the 4th of March, 1919, as I remember.

Mr. REED. And what did you do?

Mr. CARAWAY. Nothing.

Mr. REED. What did you do toward raising excess-profits taxes? What Republican in all the broad land even uttered a whimper about it?

Mr. McLEAN. That has been hurled at this side of the Chamber several times.

Mr. CARAWAY. And never answered.

Mr. McLEAN. I have hesitated to reply because I had hoped that the gentlemen would realize the reason why we did not do anything in 1919 and 1920.

The war was over, as my colleague suggests; but that was not the cause. A majority of one was all the Republicans had in the Senate in 1919 and 1920, and that Senator has signed the minority report against this bill.

Mr. REED. All that you had?

Mr. McLEAN. All that we had, and that Senator has signed the minority report against this bill. Yet you accuse us of not doing anything.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the Republicans with their majority, however, did not introduce a bill to reform the tax laws, no committee made any report, nor did the Senate or the House consider any amendment whatever to the tax laws.

Mr. McLEAN. We did not do it, because we did not have a working majority.

Mr. CARAWAY. They had an overwhelming majority in the House, and that is where the bill would have had to originate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. It would have had to pass both Houses and be signed by the President of the United States.

Mr. CARAWAY. They did not try to pass it through either body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators must address the Chair when they rise to speak. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. When the Senator from Connecticut said there are 103,000,000 American people who pay no taxes, he made a statement which he can not prove. Will the Senator listen to me for one moment? He forgets that the Federal Government could go to pieces and disappear and become extinct, and there would be 48 complete State governments absolutely sovereign and complete in their governmental functions. I wish to say to him that, if the laws of his State are like those of mine, every man pays a tax—county, municipal, and State. The very bed upon which a sick man lies and suffers is taxed. The very pot and frying pan and skillet which his wife uses to cook his victuals are taxed. He pays a tax on his head, whether that head be gray like mine and that of the Senator from Connecticut, or whether it be that of the youth of 21, and whether it be that of a white man or a black man.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, I understand that the word tax comes from the Latin word "taxare," which means price.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It means confiscation; that is what it means.

Mr. McLEAN. And everything we buy is taxed to the extent of what we pay for it. I was talking about the taxes imposed by the Federal Government.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; I am coming to that. If we have 103,000,000 people who can pay no Federal tax, who is to blame for it? It is the lawmakers who put the burdens on the poor, and do not put them on the rich. The Senator knows as well as I do that I could take Alexander Hamilton's report on manufactures, or Henry Clay's speeches for the American system, and I could riddle his bill. I can cite the Senator to speeches made in the Senate before the War between the States, in which it was stated time and again that Europe had her problems of pauperism and the poor, but that America had no poor. Now, if we have poor folks to the extent of 103,000,000, who made them poor?

Mr. McLEAN. I did not say they were poor.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator said they pay no taxes.

Mr. McLEAN. But I did not say they were poor.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If they do not pay any taxes it follows they are poor, and who made them poor?

Mr. McLEAN. On the contrary, it has been my position all along that it would be much better for the 103,000,000 people who do not now pay a direct tax to pay a small direct tax, which is imposed frankly and honestly, than it is to be burdened with indirect taxes until we have 3,000,000 men walking the streets and 4,000,000 more working on half time because of the shortage in industrial capital caused by these high taxes in part.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I could take the quotation from Sidney Smith, of England, and apply it to this bill. Under our tariff system we tax everything, from the plaything of the boys and girls, their toys, their balls—as Mr. SMOOT made a sotto voce remark—let me hear that from the other farmer. I see the two farmers in consultation. What did he say?

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator ask me the question?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did.

Mr. SMOOT. I say nearly one-half of the amount of goods come in here free, so any tariff bill has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator is absolutely mistaken. He said the other day that he could demonstrate that it would be an injury to us to collect our debts from Europe.

Mr. SMOOT. So I can demonstrate it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator can not demonstrate anything of the kind.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, of course, may make that statement, but that does not prove it is true. Not only that, but I will take the returns of the Treasury Department and show the Senator how many articles come in here free and how many come in dutiable.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The cotton mills in my own State ship their products to foreign countries and sell them to foreigners cheaper than they will sell them to the workmen in their own mills.

Mr. SMOOT. That has nothing to do with the tariff whatever.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It has everything to do with the tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may say that, but I say that it makes no difference whatever with the tariff. The statement that I made on the request of the Senator—if the Senator from Florida will pardon me, because I do not wish to take his time—was in answer to a statement made by the Senator from Georgia that our tariff system here taxes everything that comes into this country.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Three or four thousand articles. How many more come in?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there was no qualification whatever in the Senator's former statement.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Three or four thousand articles.

Mr. SMOOT. There are qualifications now made by the Senator from Georgia. I made a broad statement as to the amount that came in taxed and the amount that came in free.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator tell me what necessity of life that is bought in the store comes in here free? Give me the name of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to ask the Senator from Florida to yield for that purpose now. I can take a copy of the bill which I have here and read it, but I do not wish to take the time of the Senator from Florida for that purpose now.

Mr. TRAMMELL. No; please postpone it to another time.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish the Senator from Georgia would take the tariff bill of 1913 that is now in force and read the free list himself. He will find it there.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls attention of the Senator from Florida to the precedent of the Senate. When a Senator yields to another Senator to make a speech he loses the floor. The Chair merely calls the attention of the Senator from Florida to it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I shall take notice of that in the future. The discussion went a little adrift and got beyond the present bill.

Following the argument of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] his contention seems to be that very largely the prosperity of the country is contingent upon relieving the profiteers from any taxation upon their excess profits. That is about the only deduction I have been able to make from the line of argument presented by him.

He also criticizes the policy of the law enacted during the war that imposes the tax upon profiteers. If that was an erroneous policy, if that policy was conducive to bringing about the distressed conditions which prevail in the country at the present time, then our Republican friends are particeps criminis, because they have been in control of Congress now for almost three years, and they did not busy themselves to try to make any change in the law until within the last three or four months. If that contributed to or was responsible, as the Senator has practically said, for the unemployment and distress now existent, why did not the Republicans in control of both Houses of Congress bend their energies toward trying to afford relief in 1919 and in 1920, when they controlled both Houses of Congress? It never dawned upon them until the profiteers ask for the repeal of the tax that the taxes upon excess profits were having anything to do with the prosperity of the country. So far as retarding prosperity during 1919 and 1920, I should like to know when the Senator discovered that fact. When did he discover that that was the cause of the business depression in the country?

Mr. McLEAN. It dawned on the Democratic Party, and we had such a recommendation from a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury—in fact, from two of them.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is only their personal opinion, as suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. It was not representative of the opinion of the Democratic Party.

Mr. McLEAN. We might have done it if we could have controlled this body and had the President.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As I gather from the argument of the Senator, the only reason why the Republican Congress did not get busy in 1919 and 1920 was because of some Democratic Secretary of the Treasury suggesting it, and therefore it would not do to attempt to do anything during the administration of a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury because, forsooth, he had suggested that the law be repealed. That is a very poor excuse for the Republican Party falling asleep upon the doormat in 1919 and 1920 and not trying to afford any tax relief to the American people.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TRAMMELL. If he wishes to make a speech, I can not yield. If he desires to ask only a question, I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wish to ask the Senator with reference to the attitude of his candidate for President in the last campaign on the question of a repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It seems that the American people did not quite approve of him either, but so far as I am concerned I did not approve of any advocacy of the abolition of a tax upon excess profits. It has been demonstrated here that a large majority, practically all, of the Democrats who are Members of the Senate disapprove of the repeal of a tax upon excess profits. After doing nothing for two and one-half years our Republican friends bring in a tax bill here, and then because Democrats deign to criticize the law and seek to have the bill amended, they talk about lengthy discussions, allege undue delay, and say we are not expeditious now. I should like to find out why no effort was made to expedite tax reform during that two and one-half years that our Republican friends were doing nothing in regard to taxation. When our Republican friends were before the voters in 1918 asking them to elect a Republican Congress there was no intimation that they would mark time until after the presidential election in 1920, because until after that time we would have a Democrat in the President's chair.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator whether the Democratic minority report upon the pending bill condemns the repeal of excess-profits taxes and states that the Democratic Party will oppose that repeal?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know whether it does or not. I know some Democrats upon the committee have condemned very bitterly the attempted repeal of the excess-profits taxes. They have done that upon the floor of the Senate. If the Senator is going to revert back to the history of action of the committee, I would suggest that neither did the Republican majority members of the committee favor the provisions which they have since yielded to and placed in the bill.

Republican Senators did not write into their majority report that the tax upon railroad transportation should be repealed as of January 1 next, but after the Democrats led a fight to have that tax repealed and smoked out some of their progressive Republican friends, who had been sitting idly by and saying nothing, uttering not a word of criticism of the bill—or if they were doing it they were doing it behind closed doors—it was only when the Republican members of the so-called agricultural "bloc" awakened to the fact that they could not go before the country and long maintain themselves with their overtures of progressivism and sit by and let the bill go through as it was that we see there were some acrobatic stunts; we witness a gathering of the clans, and the Republican Senators agreed to change certain provisions of the bill; they agreed to abolish the tax upon transportation as of January 1. They furthermore agreed to increase instead of making decreases upon surtaxes; they further made other modifications in the way of striking out the proposed tax upon parcel-post packages, and so on.

However, the majority members of the committee were not for those propositions to begin with. Whether or not the discussion upon the measure and the amendments which have been proposed have been of any benefit or not, we start off at least with the indorsement of those accomplishments and an agreement upon many of the suggestions proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and other Members upon the Democratic side, because the suggestions which have been agreed to by the majority Members of the Senate were proposed by Senators on the Democratic side.

We have had reasonably lengthy discussion upon the bill, but such discussion was absolutely necessary unless those who entertained views contrary to those of the majority of the committee sat idly by and allowed the measure to be railroaded through the Senate without any consideration.

I have a great deal of sympathy for our friends of the agricultural bloc. I have always been about as much a friend of the agricultural interests, I think, as have those who are members of that bloc, and I will affiliate with the members of the bloc, so far as that is concerned; but, Mr. President, I think that the press of the country has given undue credit to the so-called agricultural bloc, or the Republican members of it, because it has been made to appear that the Democratic members had nothing to do with this little private agreement regarding amendments. The press of the country give the Republican members of the agricultural bloc too much credit when they try to make it appear that they are responsible for the reformation of this bill, if it has been reformed. I did not hear one of those gentlemen protesting upon the floor of the Senate against the provisions of the measure. There might have been one or two amendments proposed by them, after they had previously been proposed by certain Democrats.

The Republican members of the agricultural bloc merit whatever credit they may receive for being aroused to the necessity for certain amendments to this bill, but they deserve the condemnation of the American people for conceding to the Republican majority that they could write into this bill a provision repealing the tax upon excess profits.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield only for a question, Mr. President.

Mr. McLEAN. I should like, if I may, to trespass upon the Senator's time long enough to state to him precisely the effect of the first amendment which was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I want to get through, and I had rather the Senator from Connecticut should make his speech a little later.

Mr. McLEAN. It will take me but a minute, and I think it will interest the Senator from Florida to know that as to the first amendment which was rejected I personally had every reason to vote against it, because under the law as it now is, without the amendment, I know that I have stocks which I can sell at a profit and still deduct $150 a share loss on my net income-tax return. I did not, however, think it was fair. The Government is going to lose $50,000,000 because of those leaks, and I wanted to stop them. That is the reason why I, with six other informed Senators, voted for the first amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the Senator's action seems to have been very patriotic. I am sorry, however, the Senator from Connecticut did not observe a great many more leaks in the bill and try to put a bung into some other bungholes that are to be found in the measure. I am sure, with his spirit of patriotism, if he had discovered them that he would, of course, have sought to have closed up those loopholes.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator does not understand me. The leak would have been protected by the amendment which was lost.

Mr. TRAMMELL. And the Senator favored the amendment?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; I, with six other informed Senators, voted for it, as I stated to the Senator; but the amendment was lost.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not know precisely the significance of the expression "informed Senators."

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think that if those Senators had understood the question they would have voted to take $50,000,000 out of the Treasury which might well be paid in by citizens like myself and others.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know about that, of course. We have a different idea about it.

Mr. McLEAN. I know the Senator did not know, and I thought I did.

Mr. TRAMMELL. In regard to the question of information of which the Senator from Connecticut is speaking, it depends a good deal upon the viewpoint. I find in connection with this particular bill that, while by this time they are becoming more or less informed, not very many Senators seem to be very much enlightened upon the subject. That is demonstrated by the fact that the entire bill almost has had to be rewritten since it was introduced here. Even the committee brought in 77 amendments which were not reported by the committee to begin with. So we are all learning as we go along in regard to this bill.

Mr. President, I would not be unfair or unreasonable toward capital; I appreciate the value of thrift; no one admires more than myself the man who by honest means and by honest endeavor accumulates a competency, and no one gives to him greater credit for his success. I realize that we must in order to be prosperous give just consideration to those who hold the capital of the country; but because of this desire for fairness I do not become enchanted or particularly hypnotized with the idea that we have all the time to be looking out for the large accumulations of wealth upon the theory that if we can make the rich of the country prosperous some of the prosperity will leak through and make prosperous those who are not so fortunate. I believe that those who are able to contribute to the tax burden should contribute a reasonable amount, and I do not believe that we should come down upon the poor and begin to tax them in the way of a direct tax before they have received sufficient income for the maintenance of themselves and their family. The most inexcusable feature of the whole bill is that which seeks to exempt excess profits from taxation, and yet that is what the committee proposes to do. That is what the Republican majority propose to put over.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. McLEAN. It is because the firms which are still making exorbitant profits, such as the oil producers, can still pass the tax on to the consumer and double it as they pass it on. I tried to make clear the other day that the oil concerns, for instance, and the small companies that are making excess profits are still enabled, despite the tax, to increase the value of their products and pass the tax on where there is slack competition.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have already said that there is no relief against excess profiteering in this bill, however; that is the point I make.

Mr. McLEAN. Except by removing the tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he and the other Senators who favor the repeal of the excess-profits tax are proposing to repeal that tax because it is a tax which is passed on and paid by the consumer or are they proposing to repeal it on account of those who operate the businesses that are taxed?

Mr. McLEAN. For both reasons.

Mr. SIMMONS. Which is the chief reason?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I will not yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida declines to yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not desire to lose the floor, and I have in mind the admonition of the Chair a few moments ago that I might lose the floor. I do not wish to do that.

Mr. President, so far as the question of the tax being passed on is concerned, if we are going to hold that up as a bugaboo, it will apply in regard to every feature of taxation in connection with which that argument is sought to be made. Followed to its logical conclusion, it would mean that we should abolish all taxation upon business and upon the incomes of those engaged in business and merely go out and levy a per capita tax, possibly, upon every citizen of America. The Republican majority dare not do that, but they might as well do that if they are going to claim that everything is to be passed on. In one breath the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] says business can not stand the tax on excess profits; a moment later he says the tax is passed on to the consumer. Which of these statements does the Senator mean?

I say, Mr. President, that of all the sources of revenue in this country that should not be exempt from taxation it is excess profits. I do not believe that any man who advocates such a policy can sustain himself before the American people, unless he says, "We will abolish the taxes levied for the purpose of reaching excess profits and then we will give you legislation to prevent excess profits." It is not consistent for the Republican majority to say that they are going to abolish the tax on excess profits for the purpose of getting rid of excess profits and at the same time take absolutely no step looking to affirmative legislation to prevent excess profits.

Throughout the whole country during the last campaign Republican orators and Democratic orators occupied considerable time in almost all the speeches delivered by them talking about profiteers and how they were going to punish the profiteers; yet the first act upon the part of the Republican majority in Congress in dealing with the profiteers is to give them carte blanche freedom to operate and make their excess profits and then be exempt from taxation upon them. That is the substance of this legislation.

Mr. McLEAN. We have been told a good many times by a Democratic President and Democratic orators that the Democratic Congress had enacted legislation to prevent profiteering.

Mr. TRAMMELL. They talked about it, of course; but profiteering became more rampant during the war than ever before in history.

Mr. McLEAN. You had your opportunity then. Why did you not do something?

Mr. TRAMMELL. We went out of power very soon thereafter.

Mr. McLEAN. You had six years.

Mr. TRAMMELL. A Democratic administration did put a tax on the profiteer. Now a Republican Congress proposes to relieve the profiteer of this. The Republican Party, immediately following the war, went out and told the American people how they were going to rewrite the tax laws, and won both the House and the Senate, and for over two years you just rocked along, marked time in idleness, and never made a single effort toward reforming the tax laws of the country. You can not excuse yourselves for your inaction by now repealing the tax on the profiteer. The average American citizen is going to question your sincerity if he does any thinking, and most of them do some thinking. When you try to condemn the existing law, when you try to place upon it the responsibility for the distress of the country, the country will remember that for two years or more you with a majority in both Houses sat idly by, you did not introduce a bill, you did not hold a committee meeting, you did not bring before the Senate or the House a measure to reform the tax laws of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say frankly to the Senator that the reason why I did not want to take any action, and thought it unwise to take any action, was that we had a President of the United States here who would have vetoed any bill that the Republican Party might have passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will answer that, Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me. I want to get through, and I shall be glad if the Senator will speak a little later.

The Democratic President more than two years ago came before Congress and recommended the enactment of taxation laws conforming to peace times, asserting that the laws upon the statute books at that time were written during war times and to meet the necessity of war times; but, as I stated in a discussion here some two or three weeks ago, it is merely an excuse, it is merely a subterfuge, when you talk about your being afraid the President would veto a tax law you might pass. Why do I assert that? Because a Republican Congress did not hesitate to enact legislation upon other important matters and policies. As illustrative of that, they did not hesitate to respond to the calls and the demands of the railroads of this country and write the present railroad legislation, which I opposed. They did not say to the railroads: "We will not write a law that will give you a guarantee of certain percentages; we will refuse to write a law that will give you guaranteed earnings for six months after the roads are returned to your ownership; we will not write a law giving you certain loan benefits, loaning you $300,000,000 or more for three years, and afterwards enlarging it to five, because we have a Democratic President."

You passed the present railroad law, the President signed it, and to-day the people of my State and of the Nation are crushed beneath the exorbitant, excessive, and unreasonable freight and passenger rates. I saw the hardship in store under this law and voted against it. Oh, no! When it came to the question of giving the railroads of the country relief, as they thought they were giving it to them, the presence of a Democratic President in the White House did not deter the Republican majority in the Senate and in the House; but when it came to the question of rewriting a tax law for the relief of the American people then you answer: "We did not do anything because you had a Democratic President in the White House." I think that is an excuse and not a reason.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not desire the Senator to yield the floor. I simply wanted to put into the RECORD the attitude of the President with reference to this subject. I thought it was very pertinent to the answer made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to some statement that the Senator from Florida had made.

I understood the Senator from Utah to say that they never proceeded to the enactment of legislation to repeal the excess-profits tax during the first two years that his party was in power because they knew that the President of the United States, who was then Woodrow Wilson, would veto any such bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken when he says "they." The Senator from Utah specifically stated that as far as he was concerned that was the reason why he did not press it; and I believe with all my heart that any legislation that would have materially changed the law the way I would have wanted it changed would have been vetoed by the President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to make any speech, but I wish to make this statement:

Not only the Senator from Utah but other Senators, I think, have attempted to excuse themselves for not acting more quickly in the matter of the repeal of the excess-profits tax, which they say by all means ought to be wiped off of the statute books because we are in peace times now and because the law hampers business. When it is charged that during two years of their ascendancy in both branches of the Congress they took no action, the excuse is that if they had acted the President, who at that time was a Democrat, would have vetoed the bill.

Mr. President, a very short time after the Republican Party came into power in Congress President Wilson, in his communication to the Congress, dated May 20, 1919, discussed our fiscal system and especially our revenue legislation, and declared emphatically that it needed revision so that it might be adjusted to the change in conditions resulting from the armistice and the establishment of practical peace throughout the world. In that communication he said:

> The main thing we shall have to care for is that our taxation shall rest as lightly as possible on the productive resources of the country, that its rates shall be stable, and that it shall be constant in its revenue-yielding power. We have found the main sources from which it must be drawn. I take it for granted that its mainstays will henceforth be the income tax, the excess-profits tax, and the estate tax. All these can be adjusted to yield constant and adequate returns and yet not constitute a too grievous burden on the taxpayer. A revision of the income tax has already been provided for by the act of 1918, but I think you will find that further changes can be made to advantage both in the rates of the tax and in the method of its collection. The excess-profits tax need not long be maintained at the rates which were necessary while the enormous expenses of the war had to be borne; but it should be made the basis of a permanent system which will reach undue profits without discouraging the enterprise and activity of our business men.

What the amendment of the Senator from Missouri does is to cut that tax more than half in two and retain it only as to incomes which exceed 15 per cent, and then impose a tax of 20 per cent only between 15 and 50 per cent profits. So what is now offered to the Senate is substantially the proposition which President Wilson made, that the war having ended, we might properly reduce and we ought to reduce the rates; but Mr. Wilson said that the excess-profits tax and the income tax were the mainstays of our resources from which we should draw our internal revenues.

Mr. SMOOT. And yet yesterday the Senator voted to retain the excess-profits tax just as it is to-day. That was contrary to the recommendation of President Wilson.

Mr. SIMMONS. That may be contrary to the recommendation of President Wilson, but I am talking about the amendment that is now before the body. You said you did not act because you were afraid of a Democratic President.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the greater force which his observations have when it is remembered that the excess-profits tax at that time was bringing two and a half billions of dollars, and under the proposal of the Senator from Missouri the amount to be collected would be only two hundred millions—less than 10 per cent of the larger amount which was collected under the previous tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. The fact is, Mr. President, that the excess-profits tax as proposed by the Senator from Missouri in his amendment is a tax which would only reach incomes that are not in the interest of the welfare of the people of this country. Nobody can tell me that the welfare of this country will be promoted by a few people in this country making a profit in excess of 15 per cent and reaching into much higher percentages. There may be some very hazardous undertakings in which a larger profit than 15 per cent should obtain, but for the mass of the business of the people of the country a profit of 15 per cent or more is an unhealthy profit.

Who must pay these profits, Mr. President? The people of the United States. What amount will measure the percentage of earnings of the masses of the people of this country? How many people in the United States earn as much as 15 per cent? I undertake to say that there are a hundred millions of people in this country who do not earn as much as 15 per cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator say 15 per cent on what?

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean that the profits upon the business in which they are engaged would not be equal to 15 per cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the basis of the Senator's calculation?

Mr. SIMMONS. For instance, I mean that a man who is engaged in farming does not earn 15 per cent upon his investment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It depends upon what his investment is.

Mr. SIMMONS. I mean that the man who builds houses for the purpose of renting them does not earn 15 per cent upon his investment, unless he is a profiteer; and if he is a profiteer, making more than 15 per cent, he ought not to complain if the Government takes a part of that profit.

Mr. REED and Mr. DIAL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New York is a farmer. I do not want to ask him a personal question, but has he been making 15 per cent on his farm?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not on the way it is capitalized; no.

Mr. REED. I suppose, of course, it is honestly capitalized.

Mr. SIMMONS. The point I make—I do not propose to be interrupted for the purpose of making a speech—is that the earnings of the people in the United States are so far below 15 per cent that when they are required to pay earnings of 15 per cent to a few of the great corporations of this country, that is not in the interest of the public welfare. That may be and is in the interest of the men who are operating the great concerns that are making more than 15 per cent profit; but it is an unhealthy profit, because the people who pay it do not earn that much in their own operations in business.

I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the amendment. I simply rose for the purpose of giving the Senate the benefit of a statement of the attitude of the President during the first two years the Republican Party was in ascendancy in the two branches of Congress, for the purpose of letting it be distinctly understood that the President would have cooperated in a reasonable reduction of the rates on excess profits, and that the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Missouri carries a reduction just in the line of the suggestion of the great Democratic President of the United States made by him to the Republican Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the amendment I am about to offer may change the subject for just a moment, but let me say that upon yesterday the Secretary of the Treasury published certain regulations relating to the manufacture and sale of certain alcoholic beverages for medicinal purposes. It has occurred to me that this situation is important from the revenue standpoint. I therefore offer a brief amendment to the pending measure, and if there is no objection I would like to have it read and ordered printed and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 176, in line 2, strike out the words "soft drinks" and insert in place thereof the word "beverages."

On page 176, after line 25, insert the following:

SEC. 600. That there shall be levied upon intoxicating malt liquors containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, manufactured as provided by the regulations of the Treasury Department pursuant to the national prohibition act, brewed or manufactured, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States a tax of 60 cents per wine gallon.

SEC. 601. That upon all vinous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department pursuant to the national prohibition act, which are hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, when sold or removed for consumption, a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon.

SEC. 602. That upon all spirituous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department pursuant to the national prohibition act and other intoxicating liquors that are hereafter withdrawn from bond for sale or consumption there shall be levied a tax of $6.40 per proof gallon.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the pending amendment, proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as I understand it, will not begin to apply until the profits exceed 15 per cent. Fifteen per cent is certainly a reasonable percentage on invested capital, which so often includes a very large amount of water, so called. Fifteen per cent is a satisfactory return on invested capital.

But in the table which was submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] yesterday in reply to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] he called attention to thousands of corporations whose profits exceed 15 per cent. There are 2,194 corporations mentioned in that table whose profits go to 100 per cent and over. There are 1,734 corporations whose profits run from 75 to 100 per cent. There are 4,911 corporations whose profits run from 50 to 75 per cent.

It is true, perhaps, that where a corporation can do so it passes the taxes on to the people, but it is far more difficult to do this in 1921 than in 1918, and it is certainly true that under this amendment which the Senator from Missouri has offered there will be collected $200,000,000 which otherwise would be put upon the smaller and less profitable enterprises of the country.

The Senator from Missouri proposes only that there shall be a tax of 20 per cent on profits above 15 per cent up to 50 per cent, and then 40 per cent on the profits which are above 50 per cent. That will produce, according to these tables, some $200,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator noticed that in that table, where the 100 per cent and over bracket occurs, the average invested capital was only $61,000?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I observed that; but the fact that a man has $61,000 of capital invested and is making over a hundred per cent on it certainly justifies the Government in asking that he shall make a substantial contribution to the Government that protects his excess profits.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows, of course, that in all those cases the man puts his personal power into it, and that he is really the company? It is almost like a personal service corporation. If he should die, the business would go to naught.

Mr. OWEN. He does not make his profit until he has paid his salaries.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the salaries of his assistants.

Mr. OWEN. Of his assistants and of himself, too.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. A man who is in charge of his own business certainly is going to pay himself a salary as president of the company.

Mr. SMOOT. In many cases he does, no doubt, and they allow that in other cases where he makes an exemption.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator can rely on the assurance of those gentlemen always protecting themselves in the matter of their compensation for services rendered.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is not the idea I had in mind. I was talking about these big concerns, the large corporations and trusts of the country. Under the amendment they would not pay one cent.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should be disposed to favor the entire repeal of the excess-profits tax if we had some plan accompanying this bill by which the gentlemen who are charging the American people these excessively high prices for their goods could be limited to a reasonable profit on turnover—not on capital but on turnover.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree fully with the Senator as to that. We are of one mind as to that very thing, because I think that is the only just and fair way to do it.

Mr. OWEN. In that case, Mr. President, the American people would be brought into a condition of general activity. At present there are conditions of monopoly in our country against which we have had statutes for thirty-odd years which have proved to be entirely unavailing under the administration of the Government. I will not impute the fault to one party or the other. I think the blame lies in part on both parties, in part on public opinion, and in part on the natural activities of men who want to make money however they can and to charge as much as they can get for their goods. That is human nature, and it is not peculiar to a Democrat or a Republican or a Socialist, but it applies to almost every man engaged in commerce. But if we could have these monopolies limited in their profits on the turnover, then the Cement Trust and other trusts handling lumber, hardware, lime, stone, and building materials, for example, would have no occasion to limit the use of cement and building materials in the building of houses. At present the monopolies make it a part of their policy to limit output in order to control a larger percentage of profit on the goods they do turn out. That is the case of many of these monopolies, and I am of the opinion that it never will be controlled until we reach the point in this country where the great body of American opinion will insist upon a reasonable profit on the turnover.

Mr. SMOOT. In connection with that, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the capital stock of the very companies he speaks of is so inflated and so large that their profits are immense, and yet the excess-profits tax does not touch them at all.

Mr. OWEN. I think that is quite true; and I think when it comes to determining the question of the profit on turnover it ought to be upon the basis of actual valuation, and that is a thing which could be put into effect in this country, because it is comparatively easy in the matter of bookkeeping. A standard form that would be used for that purpose could make itself quite effective with a comparatively small administrative expense.

Mr. President, I merely wanted to make this observation because the old excess-profits tax, which collected twenty-five hundred millions, is one thing and this excess-profits tax, which will collect only two hundred millions, is another thing. I do think that the proposal made by the Senator from Missouri is a very reasonable one.

OPEN DISCUSSIONS AT CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, vital world problems will be discussed and decided at the approaching world conference on limitation of armaments. If the discussion and decisions be made behind closed doors, in extreme secrecy, and the world is then faced with the "accomplished fact" and must take it or leave it, the United States Senate will have another Versailles treaty to consider and the world may again be disappointed because its statesmen, acting as rulers, behind closed doors may again be moved too far by national and commercial ambitions rather than the American ideals of full justice and of the golden rule.

World opinion will sustain the doctrines of true democracy, equal justice to all, and special privileges to none; the right of all people of common language and customs occupying the same country to govern themselves in their own way; the right of every nation to be free from invasion and the fear of invasion, with freedom of commerce, communication, and transportation.

World opinion can not exert itself if the conference on limitation of armaments is behind closed doors.

The same publicity that we have in the United States Congress or the British Parliament should be voluntarily adopted by the representatives to the world conference and insisted on by the people of the world and their various representatives.

I ask to place in the RECORD a demand of this character by William Allen White, published in Collier's Weekly, October 15, 1921. He urges open conferences with great vigor, in strenuous English, and with a cogent argument deserving consideration. The substance of this argument I commend to the Senate.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Collier's Weekly for Oct. 15, 1921.]

THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE WILL NOT BE THE WORLD'S TOWN MEETING IF THE SECRET FORCES ATTEND THAT WROTE THE TREATY OF VERSAILLES—WILL THEY FOOL US TWICE?

(By William Allen White.)

TURN ON THE LIGHT.

"The destiny of every American and his children and his grandchildren is bound up in the outcome of this conference. His taxes, his food, his standard of living, his life itself * * * are to be determined. What right have any four American commissioners, however wise they may be * * * to sit in such a council behind closed doors with the gamblers of Europe and hazard our destiny?"

"Fool me once," says the proverb, "and it's shame on you; fool me twice and it's shame on me!" The United States of America should blazon that proverb upon the public buildings of the land for the next few weeks and while the disarmament conference is in session. For in that conference the problems of the peace conference at Paris will arise again. Those problems are no nearer settlement than they were the day after the armistice, nearly three years ago. Indeed, the Paris conference and the Versailles treaty added to the problems of the war the grievous burdens of secret diplomacy. And in the three years that have followed the war the world—that portion of it which we are pleased to call civilized—has stagnated until decay threatens seriously.

Something awful has happened to Christendom. It is more than the paralysis of commerce, though that is a part of it. It is more than industrial debility, which surely is a part of the cataclysm. It is more than political reaction and apathy that chokes and poisons the springs of progress. It is something deeper than the social decadence which is seen in every caste and class and country—the loosening of moral stays and the wilting of ancient standards. The things that are so hopelessly apparent in the realms of business, of industry, of politics, of the social order, are mere symptoms of a spiritual disease. Christendom is sick for lack of Christianity. Faith is dying—faith in men largely. For it is faith that bellies the sails of commerce when the ship goes out; faith that honest men will man her, that honest men will take her cargo; that honest men will send back a decent gain to the owners. It is faith that makes men sweat in industry; faith that their day's work will bring them a decent living, that their day's planning will yield them a good profit. Faith is the centripetal force that holds men together in States, in nations, in associated power; faith that the word of rulers is dependable; faith that the common sense of the people may be trusted to respond to humanity's decent needs under government. Faith holds the home inviolate, and makes the social compact strong and wholesome.

And the golden rule, which is the essence of the Christian philosophy, is the basis of faith. But the golden rule is badly tarnished to-day. It has fallen into desuetude. The pessimist, the grouch, the greedygut, even the cynic, are expounding the world's current philosophy, and everywhere men are dwelling in fear. The terror of a vast unbelief is gripping mankind in some sort of spiritual glacial epoch which threatens chaos. And what is in the hearts of men reflects itself in their counsel. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," and so will he make the events that are conceived in his head.

What has happened? Surely it was not entirely the war. In November, 1918, men had high hopes. "The day of glory has arrived." The happiest day the world ever saw was November 11, three years ago. The vanquished believed in the chivalry of the victors, and the victors believed in it themselves. Disillusion came at Paris, slowly in an excruciating anticlimax, but inexorably and without extenuation or relief.

WHEN THEY BARRED THE DOOR.

There, in the treaty of Versailles, the world lost its faith. The fact that the men who made the treaty did not dare publish it for weeks after it was finished is a mocking proof that they knew its unspeakable iniquity. What flimsy protest they made about courtesy to the Germans is almost as shameless as the treaty. For the Germans forthwith printed it and scattered it broadcast—before it was disclosed to the senates and parliaments that should have known officially of the treaty's contents. The treaty, when it was read and understood, became a veritable bible of antichrist. The covenant of the League of Nations, which was a noble document, became in the public mind debased by association with the treaty. And the hope of mankind, which might have been restored after the war through the covenant of the league, went down with the treaty.

And the hand that wrote the evil into the treaty—the devil's own hand—was secrecy.

It was made a bad treaty because it was written behind barred doors. Behind barred doors decent men become the children of darkness. If the superb spirit of the Allies and the chastened heart of Germany had been available day by day and week by week as a corrective of the sections, clauses, and paragraphs of that treaty as it was growing, it would have been another treaty. The common people of Europe and of America desired no hate nor greed nor revenge in their statement of the war's meaning and in the announced price of victory. They demanded justice. But they were horrified when they knew what had been done in the name of justice. It was a ruler's treaty and a ruler's peace.

The war was for democracy; the treaty binds mankind to autocracy; not kings and hereditary despots; not the old medieval order but a new order just as wicked. For the treaty is so sown with avarice and with intrigue and with commercial and political and imperial greed that if it remains intact the world must spend billions upon billions of the people's taxes every year in warships and aircraft and big guns and soldiers to enforce the treaty. It is the very nest egg of wars; from it even now are hatching hell upon earth and bad will among men.

AT THE WORLD'S TOWN MEETING.

The disarmament conference will only repeat the blunder men made at Paris unless the peoples of the earth can sit in the conference. It must be, indeed, the world's town meeting. Until the world does have a town meeting, it will not be safe for democracy. And we Americans, who have staked our whole fortunes upon democracy, must stand for the publicity which sustains democracy. In secret the same forces that wrote the treaty of Versailles will write the disarmament pact, and it will be just as miserable a hobble upon the feet of men as the thing that the devil devised at Paris.

Here in America we are used to democratic aspirations. They are so common that demagogues pick them up and flaunt them. In Europe demagoguery thrives upon imperialism. Europe has no counterpart of Roosevelt, Bryan, Borah, Wilson, Johnson, men of integrity and talent who thrive in politics preaching various direct applications of the golden rule in institutionalized government. The European statesman who would thrive must serve his class as against some other class. He must serve his country against some other country. He must incarnate egoism. Our statesmen must impersonate altruism to get popular approval.

Now, Europe will send to the conference men with their own axes to grind. We have no axes. We want to abolish axes if we can—at least to substitute hatchets, in the fond hope that we shall soon come to jackknives and eventually to spoons. But don't forget that Europe has axes, and her ruling classes want axes, and probably at best can be persuaded only to sheathe them and take out the handles. It was so in Paris. We wanted the good of humanity. We desired to express the victory in terms of Christian civilization. We had no desire for substantial material rewards as our share in the victory. We demanded only lasting world peace—the long-hoped-for "war to end war." And Europeans thought of the war in other terms—in terms of colonies and indemnities and commercial advantages and boundaries and spheres of influence and all manner of crassly material things. Of course, their dead did not die for these things. But their rulers demanded them and inflamed the people after the war to accept them. The same Europe is coming to this disarmament conference with the same spirit. Time has not changed nor chastened it. And we have the same altruistic desire for a better world.

It's the same old game, with the same old counters for the same old stakes. Now, shall the devil close the doors and run the same old cards in the same old course? There you are. If we are to have a world safe for democracy, we must begin to act like a democracy, not continue to ape the ponderous secrecy and poppycock of the outworn autocracies. Secrecy was their strongest weapon. It is our one vital danger. Without publicity—such publicity as, for instance, the American Congress has or the British Parliament enjoys—the conference of the Allies will become a feudal council and its final agreement a war-breeding alliance.

The ways of darkness are the ways of darkness, no matter who walks therein. It was not at all that the statesmen of Europe are bold, bad, designing men that made the Paris conference such a mess; nor was it that President Wilson failed or was outwitted. America desired one thing; European rulers desired another. Neither was a sufficient check to the other, as either would have checked the other if both had been playing the same game for the same stakes. But if the common people had been enlightened—the great middle class of the world, which really does desire about one thing everywhere, peace and prosperity, even at the uncomfortable price of justice—another thing would have happened in Paris.

The middle classes of the world were after about what Wilson asked of the conference. And if through publicity he could have had them with him in the councils, they would have strengthened his hand. The treaty might have been humane and workable; the covenant, unburdened by the iniquity of a sordid treaty, would have been simple and acceptable.

And President Wilson himself is responsible more than anyone else for the fact that the conference at Paris was held in secret. Of course the others desired secrecy, but in those first days the American President was powerful enough to demand publicity. It would have thrown terror into the hearts of the French and British imperialists. To resist any strenuous demand of President Wilson's during the first weeks of the conference would have overturned the Governments in Paris and London and in Rome. For the President had been promising the middle classes of the earth the things they hoped for.

Even before the conference opened President Wilson and Clemenceau had a long-range debate upon the objects of the conference. In the French Assembly Clemenceau frankly declared that he had no use for the piffle that the President was proclaiming, and Clemenceau declared that he would go to the conference seeking a quadruple alliance based upon the idea of a balance of power. The President in London and Manchester rejoined that he would come home before he would sign such a document. The middle classes applauded the President. The ruling classes shrugged their shoulders with the French premier, and depended upon the secrecy of the council chamber to take the tuck out of the Americans. It worked. Secrecy did it. The war waged for democracy ended with a treaty of peace which perpetuated autocracy. Kings were banished. But the soldier and the statesman and the banker, whom they often serve, stood in the place of kings.

WHAT THE REPORTERS HEARD.

It was obvious in Paris that this change from the lordship of kings to that of the triumvirate was coming out of the treaty. Reporters knew this; they could predict it. But they could not be sure enough to cry aloud. For every clause of the treaty was guarded. Sometimes through the almost sound-proof walls echoes of violent scenes would come to us in the reporters' quarters.

We knew that Foch, in fine rage at the British and Americans, grandly refused to be a mere letter box to convey diplomatic suggestions to Poland.

We knew that Premier Hughes, of Australia, left the conference in high dudgeon with protesting secretaries and underlings trailing after his great hulking body, trying to check him when he stalked out because President Wilson had won the fight to give the German colonies in the Pacific only mandatory status and not in fee simple to the Australians.

We knew that when the American commissioner, Col. House, tried to patch up the differences between Italy and the President and later tried to compromise the Chino-Japanese settlements, he became so obnoxious to the President that Col. House left Paris for London rather than resign. We knew that the Italian threat to leave the conference because of the loss of Fiume and the Adriatic territory was pure movie stuff; for the Italian premier left behind him the members of the finance commission and the Reparation Commission sitting daily with the Allies negotiating for money and coal and iron. We also knew that when the Italians were railing most bitterly at the President because he had denied them their heart's desire in the Adriatic, they had on the President's desk an application for a $50,000,000 American loan, and when the President sent his note to Sonnino, which caused the spectacular break, we knew that both Lloyd-George and Clemenceau had seen the note and had not checked it.

There was such a lot of claptrap, moving-picture melodrama, put on by the great statesmen for the benefit of the ignorant public. Reporters knew to a moral certainty that it was all a tragic sham, but they did not know it in an evidential way, and could not use what they knew. When President Wilson made his brusque gesture of ordering the George Washington American readers may remember that there were 48 hours in which the White House and the Navy Department in America denied that he had ordered the boat. That was because the British Government held up the President's cable in London, where it was relayed, hoping to talk him out of going home and failing magnificently for his cause. They did talk him out of going home, and he merely failed ingloriously.

That episode revealed to us one important thing: That out of the war Great Britain had taken absolute control of the European cable service. No American business goes to Europe which does not pass through British hands. It was one of the details which President Wilson either overlooked in his eagerness for the covenant of the League of Nations or traded for value received from the British. We felt that he was trading much; too much. The President desired the treaty and the covenant of the league to be one document. While he was in America the two documents were separated. France, England, Italy, America signed the memorandum of separation. When the President returned he demanded that the separation be annulled. The French vociferously and publicly and apoplectically declared that there would be a separation of the document.

A SECRET HORSE TRADE.

A few days after the President's return Lord Robert Cecil officially and on behalf of the British commissioners announced the fact of the separation. A secret horse trade was made between President Wilson and the British. What was the consideration? We reporters felt that it might have been the chains for Egypt and Ireland. For after Lord Cecil's declaration that there would be one document, Egypt's case waned before the conference. But this is mere guesswork. The people, however, had a right to know what were the bargains, what was the price of the liberty of an ancient people.

Why was Col. House kicked upstairs to London to establish the secretariat of the League of Nations during the heat of the conference? President Wilson at one time prepared an article for the covenant of the league guaranteeing the right of religious freedom to all people. It was aimed at the protection of the Jews against pogroms. He withdrew it. Why? Was it because the Japanese demanded also the guaranty of racial equality? That was the gossip. But should not the millions of Jews and the millions of Japanese on the earth know definitely why their rights were bartered about the conference like chips and whetstones?

At one time in the conference the French proposed to pool the war debt. The British rather timidly seconded the proposal. Japan and America, having most of the I O U's of the world, objected. Here was a proposal that affected the lives of billions of people. Not a hint of it came out officially during the conference. It might easily have been adopted. Good or bad, the thing was deeply important. Yet behind closed doors, with no restraints of public opinion, the Paris conference tossed the destinies of humanity about like poker players using matches for chips and stakes.

THE STAKE IS TREMENDOUS.

The disarmament conference will see the same game repeated if publicity is not guaranteed. Make no mistake about this disarmament conference. It is no mere casual diplomatic horse show. It is a serious attempt of the major allies to undo the work of Paris. The pact providing for disarmament either will become a new League of Nations or it will be drafted into the existing League of Nations and give America her excuse for participating in the league.

We are about to enter either a quadruple alliance that will bind us through our financial holdings into the heart of the world's great tragedy, or we are about to write a clause of the League of Nations that will save the Republican face and bring us into that group of nations. In either case the destiny of every American and his children and his grandchildren is bound up in the outcome of this conference. His taxes, his food, his standard of living, his very life itself through potential wars, are to be determined in great measure by this conference. What right have any four American commissioners—however wise they may be, and however disinterested and high-minded they may be—to sit in such a council behind closed doors with the gamblers of Europe and hazard our destiny?

It is the same old game that they played in Paris. We sit into it demanding no material gains of any earthly sort. We want only peace on earth among men of good will. Japan wants domination of the Pacific. Great Britain desires a free hand in India and a freedom of the seas which will join her Pacific colonies to her with bands of steel. France wants the commercial and political and spiritual leadership of the European Continent, and to gain it she must have Germany strangled for a generation. A low French birth rate and a high German birth rate make the rivalry inevitable, and the need of British and American aid imperative. Everywhere Americans are concerned. The $10,000,000,000 debt that Europe owes us can not be ignored. We are in the world and in the world's politics to stay, and whether we will or not. This disarmament conference is merely a session of the trustees who hold the world in political and financial receivership. It has all the power it cares to take. And upon the use the conference makes of the power depends the restoration of civilization.

Who should guide America in that conference? Four men and with sometimes a suggestion from President Harding, who already is burdened almost to the breaking point with domestic affairs? These men are splendid delegates; their superiors will not sit in the conference. But the wisdom of the American people is their superior. The people have rights in that conference, which are inherent in their rights to a republican form of Government. They should sit in the conference, but they can sit in the conference only through the utmost publicity.

And publicity is entirely possible. It is possible in the United States Congress, in the French Assembly, in the British Parliament. Much may be done in committees; proposals may be drafted there. But while proposals are under debate, the debate and the vote upon the proposals should be before the people of the world.

HOW WE LOST YAP.

And it should be no sham debate, no cut-and-dried proceedings such as Paris offered. It was the sham of Paris that chloroformed the world. By professing to hold open meetings when the full council was called the intriguers of Paris gave the idea that "open covenants" would be actually "openly arrived at." As a matter of fact, the full council was not summoned to meet until everything coming before it had been settled in secret.

America lost the island of Yap through chicanery. At least, a well-authenticated story from one of the shrewdest of the American experts who accompanied the commission to Paris declares that we lost Yap because our beloved allies deceived the President. He had been fighting for Yap for weeks. Time and again he had defeated attempts to give the island to the Japanese, who desired it inordinately. Apparently the Allies desired to oblige the Japanese if it could be done without offending the Americans. But the President was adamant.

One bright spring day some one—not a Japanese—proposed a resolution disposing variously of a job lot of unimportant possessions of our late enemies, describing each lot in the terms of technical geography. The discussion, which was in the Council of Ten, ranged along amicably enough. No one mentioned the island of Yap. The President agreed to the motion, and in the meantime, back of him trying to get his attention, two of his experts were frantic.

They knew that Yap was carefully concealed in the mass of geographical description. The President paid no heed to his pestiferous young experts. An hour later when he left the room his experts told him what had been done. He was dumfounded at the duplicity of our allied and associated powers. But what was done was done and could not be undone. If real debate and genuine publicity had prevailed at Paris, America would have known for days ahead what was threatening around the island of Yap, and the very reporters in the room, if they had been allowed there, would have jogged the President's elbow.

The Russian policy of the Allies failed at Paris because of its secrecy. England and America desired an amicable settlement with the Russians—all the Russians, all of the small principalities into which the Russian Empire was broken. France, desiring military, commercial, and political supremacy of the Continent of Europe, demanded a military settlement which would restore the value of the Russian bonds. Frenchmen held those bonds in tubfuls. England and America in secret forced France to agree to the Prinkipo conference, an attempt to get all the Russian governments to agree to what was in effect a truce and find some binder of common interest that would unite Russia. France, intriguing with the exterior governments of Russia, prevented the Prinkipo conference, prolonged the futile war, which cost thousands of lives and millions of treasure and achieved nothing. Great Britain is trading with Russia. America is feeding Russia. France is still quarreling with Great Britain about the Polish boundary, and her tubfuls of bonds are still worthless. Publicity in January, 1919, while the Prinkipo proposal was pending, would have stopped France, and negotiations rather than war might have settled the Russian problem.

WHAT AMERICA WANTS.

These, of course, are twice-told tales. But why should they be thrice told? France has not changed her aspirations. Great Britain will send to the Washington conference men representing Great Britan's imperialistic aims, as she sent such men before. Japan wants to-day exactly what she wanted two years ago. Italy still dreams of a Near Eastern policy.

And America still wants nothing but peace and lower taxes. Our aims are few and simple, but if they are achieved we shall change the international relations of the globe. We have with us in our aspirations the common people everywhere. In Europe these people have flexible governments, and can overthrow them. Given knowledge of what is easily within their reach—disarmament, with understanding among the nations looking to the peace of the world—European peoples will demand it. If their imperialistic statesmen bicker with us in the light of publicity on the proposal to disarm, their Governments will fall, not in four years, not at the end of a stated period, but at once, by recall, quickly, overnight, and new statesmen will appear in Washington. If President Wilson had left the council table in wrath when he found the imperialistic cards on the table and the seeds of war in the stake, if he had told civilization what America demands and what the allied and associated powers were really doing, a political revolution in Europe might easily have changed the council in six weeks.

To-day America's one hope is in an open conference. The things we are asking are realizable. The lever of European chaos makes us irresistible in our demands if we state these demands daily in their clearest, simplest terms to mankind. This can be done only through debate and official utterance. There is no channel by which debate and official utterance can reach the nations of mankind if the conference is closed. The weight of liberal opinion all over England, France, Japan, and Italy can not crush the imperialistic designs of the actual Governments of these countries if we withhold the facts from free, open, intelligent discussion in the world while the questions are pending. It will do no good to record our good intentions in history. We must see that our good intentions make history.

FOR THE "HARD-BOILED."

Now, all this tall talk of good intentions and of the angels' song about peace on earth, all this roseate dreaming of the federation of mankind and the parliament of the world, seems to some practical minds to be politics in cream puffs. So let us for the moment drop the language of the Puritan and adopt his basic way of thinking. For, after all, the cant of Puritanism is only the moralization of the main chance.

In America all this grand talk affects one thing—taxes. Wars make taxes. We are faced with constantly increasing taxes—billions of taxes, if we can not restrain the war spirit of the rulers of humanity outside of this country. Probably America's debtors can not pay even the interest on what they owe us unless we can stop progressive competitive armament. So as a cold-blooded horse-trading Yankee proposition we must make this disarmament conference "go" if we are to succeed as a Nation of traders in the good things of this earth, most of which we have exclusively for sale in shipload lots.

Let us pretend that we are "hard-boiled"; that we don't care what happens to the other nations of the earth so long as it does not happen to us. Let us say that we can stand by complacently and see their sons killed in battle, their homes ravaged, their civilizations decay. But they owe us money. To default will hurt us. To stop buying from us will bankrupt us. Unless they have a surplus above their taxes to invest in our good things, which we are selling in shipload lots, these good things will rot on our farms and rust in our factories and at our mills. Every dollar we save from going into armament in taxes for the other peoples of the earth is headed our way. We can grab a piece of it. They must make their own guns. But we can sell them the products of peace. Selling the products of peace is how we Americans live.

That is the song the angels are singing. That is what is ringing through the hosannas about peace on earth among men of good will. That is what we really mean by the brotherhood of man.

So, after all, while the preachers and the reformers and the uplifters are clamoring sweetly for the dawn of a better day through this disarmament conference, it is highly important that the chambers of commerce, the agents of big business, and the heads of the labor unions—practical men who never fool themselves—should be stirring their bones in the demand for an open conference. For if we close it the outcome will be disastrous. And if the taxes of the world keep going into armaments—ships and guns and soldiers and gas and aircraft and machinery of destruction—your Uncle Sam may as well hang up the fiddle and the bow for this era of our civilization and wait for the general resurrection in some other and far-distant time for his full development.

We are all in one boat on this planet. Civilization can not rot in spots. Like "the little dog whose name was Rover," when civilization is dead it is dead all over. If it rots, we rot with it, and the blight of war has touched us all. And the dry rot of civilization comes from the aphis of hate that the war released. The world must have faith before it can resume the business of civilization—faith of men in men, faith of nations in nations, faith of all of us in the general decency of mankind and the changeless goodness of God. But faith never grows behind closed doors and in secret conclaves. Men make their noblest professions and square them with their greatest deeds while they are being watched. Open diplomacy is the safest diplomacy.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION AT RIO DE JANEIRO.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to get the concurrence of the Senate in the House amendment to the joint resolution with regard to the Brazilian exposition, passed the other day. The House has passed substantially the same measure. The differences are slight and I think are all improvements, and I move to concur in the amendment of the House.

I ask to have the amendment of the House laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) accepting the invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in an international exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That said invitation is accepted.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to appoint a commissioner general and five commissioners to represent the United States in the proposed exposition, the amount of whose compensation shall be determined by the Secretary of State: Provided, That two of the said commissioners to be designated by the President shall serve without compensation or allowance for expenses. The said commissioner general shall, under the direction of the Secretary of State, make all needful rules and regulations in reference to the contributions from this country, and to control the expenditure incident to the installation and exhibit thereof, the pay of the commissioner general, commissioners, officials, and employees, and the preparation of the reports of the exposition, and the general results thereof; and he shall make all arrangements necessary for the preparation, transportation, installation, display, and proper care of the exhibits of the Government of the United States, with the cooperation and assistance of the various executive departments, institutions, and branches of the Government that may participate in the exposition, as well as to furnish such information service to private exhibitors and prospective exhibitors as he may deem necessary and feasible: Provided, That the executive departments of the Government may designate officials or employees of their respective departments for service in connection with said commission, but no such official or employee so designated shall receive a salary in excess of the amount which he has been receiving in the department where employed, plus such reasonable additional allowance for expenses not now authorized by law as may be deemed proper by the Secretary of State, in view of the fact that such service is to be performed in a foreign country: Provided further, That no person appointed or employed by virtue of the provisions of this act shall receive a greater salary than $15,000 per annum, and not more than one person shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum, and not more than three persons shall receive salaries in excess of $7,500 per annum.

SEC. 3. That officers and employees of the executive departments and other branches and institutions of the Government in charge of or responsible for the safe-keeping of objects, articles, etc., property of the United States, which it is desired to exhibit, may permit such property to pass out of their possession for the purpose of being transported to and from and exhibited at said exposition as may be requested by the commissioner general, such exhibits and articles to be returned to the respective departments and institutions to which they belong at the close of the exposition: Provided, That the commissioner general, with the approval of the President, at the close of the exposition may make such disposition of the buildings and other property of the United States used at the exposition, which it will not be feasible to return to the United States, as he may deem advisable.

SEC. 4. That the Shipping Board is authorized to give the commission such assistance as may be necessary and to make special rates and special sailing schedules for the transportation of governmental and private exhibits and participants to and from the exposition.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to collect and prepare suitable specimens of the agricultural and forestal productions of the several States of the Union for exhibition at the exposition and accompany the same with a report respecting such production, to be printed in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages, the expense of the same to be paid out of the appropriation hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Commerce is hereby authorized to collect and prepare a suitable exhibit of the fisheries industry of the United States for exhibit at the said exposition and accompany the same with a report respecting such industry, to be printed in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages, the expense of the same to be paid out of the appropriation hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to collect and prepare a suitable exhibit of the mining industry of the United States for exhibition at the said exposition, and to accompany the same with a report respecting such industry, to be printed in the English, Spanish, and Portuguese languages, the expense of the same to be paid out of the appropriation hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 8. That in order to defray the necessary expenses above authorized, including the salaries of commissioners and employees, the cost of preparing the various Government exhibits, transportation, installation, display, and return of exhibits, construction and equipment of building, and acquisition, preparation, and maintenance of site and grounds, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available for use by the commissioner general for the purposes of this resolution, and to remain available until expended or no longer required, all expenditures out of said appropriation being made subject to approval by the Secretary of State: Provided, That no indebtedness shall be incurred hereunder in excess of the amount herein authorized to be appropriated.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress within six months of the close of said exposition a detailed statement of the expenditures which may have been incurred under the provisions of the resolution, together with all reports called for under sections 5, 6, and 7 of this resolution, which reports shall be prepared and arranged with a view to concise statement and convenient reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate concur in the action of the House. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator state briefly just what the changes are? I do not care for the details.

Mr. LODGE. I will.

The Senate provided for three commissioners instead of five. The House provides for five commissioners, with the following proviso:

That two of the said commissioners to be designated by the President shall serve without compensation or allowance for expenses.

It leaves it substantially the same, except that they can appoint a commissioner resident in Rio.

They also put in the following limitation:

That no person appointed or employed by virtue of the provisions of this act shall receive a greater salary than $15,000 per annum, and not more than one person shall receive a salary in excess of $10,000 per annum, and not more than three persons shall receive salaries in excess of $7,500 per annum.

It is a limitation on the salaries, which I think a very sound one.

They also put in, in section 8, before the word "appropriated," of the Senate bill, the words "authorized to be," to comply with the rules of the House.

They also put in the following proviso at the end of the same section:

That no indebtedness shall be incurred hereunder in excess of the amount herein authorized to be appropriated.

I think those are all improvements in the joint resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate concur in the action of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, many of our Democratic friends seem to be sorely troubled over the existing situation. It is apparent that if they felt sure that the Democratic Party could get the credit for the changes that have been made in this bill since it was reported they would declare it a good bill; but fearing that they can not get the credit, they therefore wish to declare it an iniquitous measure.

Mr. President, I ask at this point, How did the Democratic Party tax corporations before the war, in time of peace, compared with the proposal to tax corporations in this pending bill? We hear much from them to-day concerning the escape of wealth in corporate form from its share of taxes, but I have before me a table from the Statistical Abstract showing that before the war, in 1916, under the Democratic tariff policy and under Democratic tax legislation, the corporate net income of the corporations of the country in that year was $8,765,000,000, in round numbers, and that the tax imposed upon that corporate wealth by the Democratic Party amounted to $171,805,000, or 1.96 per cent of their income.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, at that time we were not under the necessity of raising the amount of taxes we must raise to-day. We did not then have $24,000,000,000 of outstanding Government bonds.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true, but we were raising then about $1,000,000,000. The pending bill proposes to raise about $3,200,000,000. If we had had the same amount of money to raise, then the Democratic Party following that policy would not impose a greater tax than 7 per cent upon the corporate income of the country, when it is proposed in the pending bill to impose a tax of 15 per cent upon the net income of every corporation in the country less the $2,000 exemption, and as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] suggests, a surtax upon every stockholder running up to a maximum of 50 per cent. So that it comes with poor grace indeed from the other side of the aisle to claim that they are the ones who are in favor of taxing corporate wealth and that the Republican side is endeavoring to free it from such taxation.

Now, Mr. President, who pays the excess-profits tax? Is it the large corporation with its watered stock or is it the little corporation found in every community and every State? The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] placed in the RECORD last night a table prepared by the Treasury Department showing the average size of corporations measured by invested capital earning different rates of profit based upon the returns in 1919. That table shows that corporations having an invested capital of more than $14,000,000,000 in the aggregate and having an average invested capital of $1,319,000 paid an excess-profits tax of ninety-nine one-hundredths of 1 per cent. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri now pending, based upon the same return, proposes to exempt those large corporations from any excess-profits tax whatever. That is what his amendment would accomplish. His amendment will reach corporations, but will not reach the large corporations of the country with watered stock.

The next class of corporations in the table are those whose per cent of net income to invested capital is between 5 and 10 per cent. They have an aggregate invested capital of $15,925,000,000 and they paid an excess-profits tax upon that capital of 1.93 per cent, while the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would exempt them from any excess-profits tax.

Here, then, are two classes of corporations, the largest in the United States, that combined pay less than 2 per cent excess-profits tax, and the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would exempt them from any excess-profits tax.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I wish to call attention to the fact that the capital invested in those corporations is more than half the corporate investment in the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I was just coming to that. Those two brackets alone aggregate in invested capital $30,000,000,000 against a total invested capital of all the corporations in the country of $56,000,000,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator's statement.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not to blame for that.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator is not to blame for it.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri, however.

Mr. REED. If he means to intimate that I am incapable of understanding, I accept the suggestion. Does the Senator mean to say that the amendment which I have offered now exempts from all taxes——

Mr. LENROOT. All excess-profits taxes.

Mr. REED. Exempts from excess-profits taxes those who make less than 15 per cent? The old law or the present law exempts from excess-profits taxes those who earn less than 10 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Eight per cent.

Mr. REED. The Senator voted against the retention of the provision of the old law?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now I offer an amendment which allows more profit, because I am forced to do it, if I get anything from you, and the Senator complains that that lets some people out who would be held under the present law, and yet he votes against the present law. What does the Senator want?

Mr. LENROOT. It is very simple, as I shall show in a moment.

Mr. REED. I think it is.

Mr. LENROOT. The present law works an injustice, exempting the large watered-stock corporation and taxing the little corporation. The Senator's amendment now pending simply increases that injustice; that is all. It increases the exemption of the large corporation.

Mr. REED. That is true; and we all know that there are certain very large corporations that are overcapitalized, and therefore, because the excess-profits tax as it now exists does not reach them because they are able to absorb or cover their profits as a rule by their large capitalization, not only do they escape under the present law but they will escape under the present bill unless it is amended.

Mr. LENROOT. But they will not escape under the committee proposition.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, we are all for the 15 per cent tax. The 15 per cent tax which it is proposed to levy will increase the taxes that will be paid by some of the very large corporations that are overcapitalized. That is true. It may be that the excess-profits tax will not reach some of the very large ones. If that is the case, then some plan ought to be devised in addition to the excess-profits tax to reach the very large ones. If the Senator will support me with his bloc of adherents——

Mr. LENROOT. I have no bloc of adherents.

Mr. REED. With the adherents he was connected with when this deal or trade was made—I will draw an amendment relating to excess profits that will reach the great overcapitalized corporation. But at present we are considering whether a profiteer who makes more than 15 per cent shall give up a small part of it to the Government or not, and the Senator has said we should not touch him because there is another class smaller in number but larger in capital that will not be covered by the terms of the bill. That is the argument. In other words, because we can not get all of those who are reaping large profits, we should not get any of them.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean to make the statement for the record that he considers every corporation a profiteer which makes more than 15 per cent in any given year?

Mr. REED. No; I mean to say that any corporation that makes more than 15 per cent can be taxed justly by an excess-profits tax upon what it makes above 15 per cent. I will not call every corporation that makes more than 15 per cent a profiteer, but when they get very much above that I would call them profiteers.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I had given two brackets of corporations, the large corporations of the country that are now practically escaping taxation on excess profits and under the Senator's amendment would wholly escape. Now, I wish to go to the third bracket.

The third bracket embraces corporations having a net income to 10 to 15 per cent. Their capital invested is in round numbers $9,000,000,000. They paid an excess-profits tax that year of 11.61 per cent. Under the Senator's amendment not one of those corporations would pay a dollar of excess-profits tax. So that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri now before the Senate would reach what? It would reach corporations having an invested capital of less than $316,000 and it would reach no one else.

Mr. REED. O Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. An average invested capital.

Mr. REED. Oh, that is very different—an average invested capital. There might be in that group a corporation with a capital of a billion dollars.

Mr. LENROOT. O Mr. President, that is not the way these averages are made. Of course there is a certain limit to make up a bracket and, of course, we have to get the average of that bracket.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not mean to say that a corporation under this amendment of mine would not pay any taxes if it had a capital of more than $315,000? It might have a capital of $5,000,000, $10,000,000, $20,000,000, or $30,000,000, and, as a matter of fact, does have it, and I produced the figures here from the expert of the Treasury Department showing that many of them do have it.

Mr. LENROOT. I must confess that now I do not understand the Senator from Missouri. That is not the Senator's fault.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; it is not the fault of either of us if we do not understand each other.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just in corroboration of the statement of the Senator from Missouri, I call attention to the fact that in the first bracket the average invested capital is $1,319,511. That includes all the big railroad corporations. The railroads with $100,000,000 of capital, as some of them have, are all included in that bracket where the average is only $1,319,511. But I did not rise for the purpose——

Mr. LENROOT. The first bracket includes every corporation having an income of less than 5 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But the Senator from Wisconsin is assuming that the small bracket does not reach the large corporation. Of course he is correct in that to a considerable extent. I have not any doubt, however, that included in this list is a large number of small corporations which do not make to exceed 5 per cent on their capital.

But what I desired to inquire of the Senator is this: We will take a large corporation. We will take the Pennsylvania Railroad to-day. It has a large capital. It is earning, I should say, less than 5 per cent upon its invested capital. Does the Senator feel that that railroad company should be penalized because it is merely a large corporation? Does not the Senator realize that the large corporations are in almost every instance a mere aggregation of a large number of stockholders and the average earnings of those stockholders are comparatively small? I desire to call the Senator's attention——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I can not yield further. The Senator from New Mexico may make a defense of the large corporations in his own time, but not in mine.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to ask the Senator if he is going utterly to ignore the fact that in the large corporations there is almost invariably a great number of stockholders and the individual earning of each stockholder should be taken into consideration rather than the mere size of the corporation?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly. Now, I agree with the Senator from New Mexico, and I want to ask him whether a little later he proposes to vote for the graduated tax upon corporations dependent upon income?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Now, let us see what the Senator says. He says the large corporations with a great number of stockholders must be taken into consideration, because in the case of a large corporation having a great number of stockholders net earnings mean no more than in the case of a small corporation with a small number of stockholders; and yet the Senator says he is going to vote for a graduated tax upon the larger earnings, irrespective of the capital invested or the number of stockholders.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I misunderstood the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not intend to vote for the kind of a graduated tax which he describes. I have a proposal of my own for a graduated tax upon undistributed incomes.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator does not intend to vote, then, for the Democratic proposal stated in the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] imposing a graduated tax of from 12½ to 25 per cent on the net income of corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not think that proposal has any proper foundation except as an alternative of evils.

Mr. LENROOT. But does the Senator intend to vote for it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not think so.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad to know that.

Mr. President, again referring to this table, the three brackets which I have discussed have a combined invested capital of $39,000,000,000, leaving corporations with only $17,000,000 to which the amendment of the Senator from Missouri will apply. Let us see about the small corporation. The table shows that the corporations having the largest percentage of net income have an average invested capital of $61,000 only. Let me give an illustration that came to my attention only the other day. In a certain city two men who were engaged in the insurance and loan business concluded some years ago to incorporate, and they incorporated with a capital of $25,000. They employed that capital, but only in a very incidental way. It had practically nothing to do with the earnings of the corporation, because the earnings depended upon the individual activities of the two principal stockholders, who gave their entire time to the business. They did well; they made a large income not out of their $25,000 capital but out of the efforts of both stockholders.

That little corporation had an excess-profits tax to pay of $1,100. In addition, when two men who owned the principal portion of the stock divided the earnings that were left, they had to pay a surtax upon the dividends. Senators upon the other side of the Chamber may justify that kind of an excess-profits tax, but I do not.

Let me give another illustration, Mr. President. Under the excess-profits tax will men engage in new enterprises? No man engaging in a new enterprise, whether it be mercantile, manufacturing, mining, lumbering, or otherwise, expects to make a fair profit during the first year, or even during the two years or the three years of the inauguration of the business. He, in fact, may expect at first to sustain a loss, but he goes into the business expecting that when it does become established, and if he is successful, then he will get a profit high enough to compensate him for the losses that he sustained in previous years. The excess-profits tax entirely ignores that. Therefore, Mr. President, so long as the excess-profits tax exists there is a lack of incentive for men to engage in new enterprises.

I have not any sympathy with exempting men or corporations from taxation; I think I will be readily acquitted of that charge by every Senator upon this floor; but, Mr. President, what is a corporation? No individual can get any benefit of corporation earnings except by the distribution of dividends. When we tax a corporation fairly the only way that stockholders can get any return from those earnings is by a distribution of dividends. Under the income tax law every dollar of such dividends is subject to a surtax. Therefore, there is no injustice, because no stockholder can secure any undue return or any undue advantage from corporate income, for before he may come into the enjoyment of that income he must pay to the Government a fair share in taxes thereon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a query?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. That argument would apply equally to the normal tax upon corporations. Carried to its legitimate conclusion, it would relieve all of the corporations of all taxes on the theory that, the profits being distributed to the individual stockholders, the taxes would then be paid by them. It applies equally to normal taxes and to excess-profit taxes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, of course if we assume that the dividends are distributed, the normal tax might apply, but there is no injustice to anyone in taking the normal tax at the source, which is all that this amounts to.

Mr. REED. Where is the injustice, then, in taking the excess-profits tax? If there is no injustice in taxing a corporation on its normal income a normal tax, where is the injustice in taxing it on its abnormal profits?

Mr. LENROOT. If I would concede an abnormal profit, I would readily say, No, there is no injustice in taxing an abnormal profit; but we must first agree upon what an abnormal profit is; and secondly, I am not willing to apply one principle of taxation to the small conservatively capitalized and conservatively managed corporation and not apply it to the great corporations of this country, with perhaps 50 per cent of their capital made up of watered stock.

Mr. REED. Very well. Will the Senator join me in an amendment to this bill which will propose—and I am going to use the figures now purely by way of illustration and will be willing to change or modify them—to levy an excess-profits tax upon all corporations making more than 15 per cent, and providing that if any corporation makes less than 15 per cent but has a capital in excess of $10,000,000, then it shall pay an excess-profits tax, although its profits may be as low as 7 per cent; in other words, provide a graduated excess-profits tax and graduate it in accordance with the amount of capital invested? In that way we could reach the overcapitalized industries.

I intended to work out that sort of an amendment, but it seemed to me useless to work it out and present it unless we could preserve the principle of the excess-profits tax. I have asked the question in good faith of the Senator, for, however much we may quarrel on this floor, we have been in substantial agreement on three or four propositions in this bill. If it is true, as it is true, that there are certain concerns that have overcapitalized and thereby escaped the excess-profits tax, I want to reach that sort of concern, and I am constrained to believe the Senator from Wisconsin would be willing to reach it. I say to him that if that can be done, the Democratic side of the Chamber would support a measure of that kind, if it is drawn wisely. Will the Senator get us some votes on his side for it?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in the first place, the Senator now speaking is not in a position to get any votes for anything except his own, and does not pretend to be able to do other than that. In the second place, if the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator on this floor can devise a plan for taxing fairly what are really excess profits, I shall be glad to support it; but I think the Senator from Missouri will find a great deal of difficulty in devising any such plan.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri whether it is his opinion that the excess-profits tax should be retained as it is in the present law and also that the normal tax on corporations should be increased 50 per cent?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator with perfect frankness, and I will answer him "yes," for the reason that the corporation tax of 15 per cent is levied only upon income, and if that income is low the tax is correspondingly low, and, as we need the money, I think the tax should be levied. The income tax of 15 per cent which is proposed to be levied as a corporation tax falls upon the corporation that is making only 3 per cent and takes 15 per cent of the 3 per cent; if it is making only 8 per cent it takes 15 per cent of the 8 per cent. To such corporations that kind of a tax is rather burdensome; but now the difference between the Senator and myself is this: When a corporation after paying all of its expenses has 15 per cent net, then what it makes above that it seems to me ought to bear an additional burden, and that it can not complain, if it makes 20 per cent, if upon the 5 per cent that it makes above the 15 per cent and below 20 per cent it gives up one-fifth to the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I appreciate what the Senator says, that a 15 per cent tax upon some corporations earning 3 per cent upon their actual capital would be a burdensome tax. On the other hand, there is no tax that can be devised or which ever has been devised, or, as I believe, which ever will be devised that will work with absolute justice upon every person or corporation upon whom it is imposed.

Mr. REED. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. But, Mr. President, let us see what the committee amendment increasing normal tax upon corporations does with the large watered stock corporation compared with the present law. That amendment proposes to increase the flat corporation tax to 15 per cent. Corporations having an average net capital of more than $320,000 will have their taxes increased under the proposed amendment increasing the corporation tax to 15 per cent, while corporations with an invested capital of less than that amount—I say every corporation, but I shall withdraw that expression and say that the average corporation having less than that amount—will have its taxes decreased under the proposal to increase the flat corporation tax to 15 per cent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not understand how the Senator can say that. The table that he has been talking about shows——

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to make one correction. It is the corporations having an average capital of more than $395,000 instead of $350,000.

Mr. REED. I am not raising a question about a little thing of that kind. I understood the Senator to state that corporations having less than the amount of capital he has just named, $395,000, would escape taxation under my amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I was talking about the proposal to increase the flat corporation tax from 10 to 15 per cent. Their taxes would be reduced, while the taxes upon the large corporations would be increased, with the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the taxes will not be reduced unless they are making very high excess profits.

Mr. LENROOT. I am taking this table and these returns, as the Senator understands.

Mr. REED. I see.

Mr. LENROOT. For instance, Mr. President, take the first bracket of corporations having an average invested capital of $1,319,000. The repeal of the excess-profits tax and the increase of the corporation tax will increase the taxes upon those corporations, based upon the returns of 1919, nearly 50 per cent—48 per cent.

Mr. REED. That is true. You increase the burden upon the corporation that has been making small profits, and you decrease, by repealing the excess-profits tax, the burden upon those that have been making large profits.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then, does the Senator wish to take the position that the large corporations of this country have not been engaged in profiteering, and that the small ones have?

Mr. REED. I mean to take the position—and it is the only thing we need discuss in this matter—that if the large corporations have been overcapitalized, and for that reason are concealing their profits so that they were not reached under the present law, the 5 per cent flat tax added to corporations of that class will increase their burdens, but it will also increase the burdens upon many corporations which are not large and which have been making small profits. We can not frame this bill with the idea that we are going to take the tax off of the man who has been making very high profits merely in order to put a tax upon a man who has been escaping through overcapitalization. The remedy is to apply your flat tax of 15 per cent all along the line, and then still levy an excess-profits tax on the wretch who has been plundering the public.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator, then, this question: Taking the illustration that I gave a moment ago, where the principal stockholders devote all their time and energy to the business, and where the earnings of that business are dependent in only a minor degree upon the capital invested but in principal degree upon their own efforts, does the Senator wish to impose this excess-profits tax in a case of that kind?

Mr. REED. There are some cases of that kind, but they are not large in number, and they can be taken care of without the slightest difficulty in just the way we have already in our laws taken care of the personal-service corporations. All you need to do is to extend the language of those provisions a little bit and you cover the case, but it is not proposed to extend it. Senators talk about difficulties and inequalities which we confront, and make them the excuse for this still greater inequality instead of reaching in and trying to correct the evils which they themselves now use as the buttress behind which they propose to fight the battle in the interest of the profiteer.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the attitude of the Democratic minority as a whole—I am not speaking of individuals like the Senator from Missouri, but the attitude of the Democratic Party—in opposing the repeal of this excess-profits tax, effective next January, is an afterthought upon their part. They had no such thought when they made the minority report on this bill. Read from beginning to end the report signed by the ranking member of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and you will find no suggestion that they are going to oppose the repeal of the excess-profits tax. On the contrary, such suggestion as there is is exactly to the contrary.

The Democratic minority report states:

> The war revenue legislation was largely experimental and found no precedent in former enactments of Congress devised either in war or in peace times. To reach the objects and sources of taxation desired was a most difficult task, but both political parties adopted with unanimity the war revenue legislation referred to, believing that it was justified in war times and under the then existing conditions. Its repeal was promised by all as soon as war was over.

Mr. REED. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. LENROOT. I am reading from the Democratic minority report upon this bill.

Mr. REED. What page, please?

Mr. LENROOT. On the bottom of page 1 and the top of page 2.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is general comment. Will the Senator kindly turn over to page 13, where you get to the concrete statement? I will read it to him.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. (Reading:)

> The repeal of the excess-profits tax would also result in a gross disparity between the amount of taxes hereafter to be paid by corporations, individuals, and partnerships.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course; and the suggestion in the report is not that the tax shall not be repealed but that that disparity shall be supplied in the program that the Senator suggests.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. LENROOT. We will see whether it is so or not. I read now from the speech of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] upon this bill. After going over the various parts of the bill in detail, he said, near the close:

> I want to say that if the Republicans permit us to make our desired changes in the interest of justice and fairness in this bill and will get their taxes upon a basis that one can sustain and support in conscience, and if as a part of that scheme the corporation taxes are not very materially reduced from what they are under the present law, I shall have no objection to their repealing the excess-profits tax as far as I am concerned.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that was an individual opinion. It was not the opinion of the other members of the committee. I will say to the Senator frankly that I did not know that the Senator from North Carolina had expressed that view.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. LENROOT. I am reading from the Senator's speech, in which he stated in effect that if the program of taxation outlined by the Senator in his report should be adopted, he himself would not object to the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I did say, and what I have always said, was that if in the repeal of the excess-profits tax, which would relieve the corporations of $400,000,000 of taxation, the same amount of taxation of which this repeal would relieve them was imposed upon them in some other way, so that they could not pass it on to the consumer any easier than they could pass the excess-profits tax onto the consumer, so far as I was concerned I would be satisfied.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is true. Was not the Senator's program as outlined by him the restoration of the capital-stock tax, for one thing? That is true, of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Was it not true that he also said, as stated in the report, that they would favor an increase in the normal tax upon corporations, upon a graduated basis?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and that has been acted upon.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly. Did not the Senator have in mind the repeal of the excess-profits tax and supplying the deficiency by the program that he suggested?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have never had any doubt but that the other side of the Chamber would repeal the excess-profits tax.

Mr. LENROOT. And the Senator was willing that they should?

Mr. SIMMONS. What I have sought to do and what I have hoped to accomplish was to secure the reimposition of that tax upon corporations, and I think it has not been done.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and the Senator made a specific proposal to bring that about; did he not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I tried to bring that about.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; so that the Senator contemplated that it would be brought about?

Mr. SIMMONS. But I have not been successful in having it brought about yet.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see, Mr. President. This side proposes to supply in part what is lost by the repeal of the excess-profits tax by the increase of the tax upon corporations to 15 per cent. Now I understand that the Senator from North Carolina does not object to that, except that he would graduate it so as to impose a lesser tax upon corporations having small incomes, and a larger tax, in excess of 15 per cent, upon corporations having large incomes. Am I correct?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is not correct. I have not stated what scheme of graduated income tax I would favor, but I would not favor a graduated scheme that would impose a lesser tax upon corporations than is imposed in the bill as proposed to be amended by the majority of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not wish to do the Senator any injustice, but I certainly understood from him that he stated that the Democratic minority would propose a graduated tax running from 12½ to 25 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that was the original proposition, but I think it was ascertained that that would not yield as much revenue as the flat tax of 15 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think another proposition will be made for a graduated income tax which will yield as much as 15 per cent, and probably more.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, may I ask the Senator what else he proposed to supply the deficit caused by the repeal of the excess-profits tax? Have I not stated it all?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have proposed two methods. One of them was the restoration of the capital-stock tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that is included in the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. That has nothing to do with the $400,000,000, however. That tax has been repealed. That proposition was simply to restore that tax. The other proposition was to repeal the exemptions of corporations. Then it was proposed that there should be a graduated income tax on corporations which would impose a much higher tax than the 5 per cent. But the scheme originally proposed would not do that.

It was ascertained at a conference with the actuaries that it would not do that. But even then, Mr. President, the $400,000,000 would not be made up, and the Senator knows that I discussed with him the question of increasing the flat tax, if a flat tax is to be imposed, and I presume the other side of the Chamber will control legislation upon that subject, and will impose a flat tax. I suggested that that might be larger. I suggested also that the capital-stock tax might be doubled. I suggested that a graduated income tax might be so framed that it would run up to 20 per cent, and be so adjusted as to raise a larger amount than in the original amendment proposed. I want to say to the Senator that there never has been any concealment about this.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; the Senator has been open and frank in stating that he was willing that the excess-profits tax should be repealed, provided the deficiency should substantially be laid upon corporations in some form. The Senator was not in favor, as is the Senator from Missouri, of retaining the excess-profits tax and at the same time increasing the normal tax on corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know perfectly well, however, that the Senator's party is not going to lay upon corporations, as a result of the repeal of the $400,000,000 tax, $400,000,000 of taxes by way of income taxes, or in any other form of taxation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I want to be just as frank as the Senator is. Of course, I am not responsible in any way for this proposition, not being a member of the committee; but it is proposed, the Senator will admit, to supply $260,000,000 of that $400,000,000 out of the increased flat tax upon corporations. That is true, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is correct.

Mr. LENROOT. Leaving $140,000,000 to be supplied. The original estimate in connection with the repealing of the exemption on corporations having earnings in excess of $25,000,000 was $30,000,000, was it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. So that left a difference finally between the amount received under the excess-profits tax and under the committee proposition of only a little over $100,000,000. Is not that true?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. The only point I wanted to make was that the ranking member of the committee, representing the committee when they made this report, did not intend to oppose the repeal of the excess-profits tax. That has been an afterthought. I am not charging the Senator from North Carolina with being other than open and fair about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want the Senator to understand that my personal position about this matter has not been the position of many Members on this side of the Chamber. In the speech I made I was merely stating my personal opinion.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but in the Senator's report I take it he was undertaking to reflect the opinion of the minority members of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. There was a decided division of sentiment among the minority members of the committee. They did not all agree with me by any means upon my proposition. The Senator from Missouri especially did not agree.

Mr. LENROOT. I know he did not; but the Senator can not blame this side for taking the minority report, and assuming that that reflected the position of a majority on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the point I wish to make, Mr. President. I think the Senator from Missouri has been from the very beginning opposed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and I have never charged otherwise.

Mr. President, I have talked very much longer than I had any expectation of doing. I only wish to say, in conclusion, that the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the imposition of a higher flat tax, instead of reducing taxes upon the large watered-stock corporations of this country, will increase the taxes upon them, and the corporations that will be relieved for the larger part are those little corporations in every community where the success of the corporation depends primarily, not upon the amount of capital invested, but upon the activities of their principal stockholders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH], on account of sickness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement we must dispose of all amendments on this subject at 4 o'clock, except that I believe amendments can be offered afterwards and discussed by any Senator for five minutes. I want to get a vote on this particular amendment, because I desire to offer another amendment if this amendment is defeated. Consequently I am going to take only enough time to reply to some of the arguments that have been advanced this morning.

The chief objection to this amendment of the Senator who just left the floor [Mr. LENROOT] is that under it a large number of corporations making more than 10 per cent and less than 15 per cent will not be reached by the surtax as proposed in the pending amendment. That is a curious argument for a man to make who has just voted against an amendment which did include the very corporations which he now complains are not included.

I had offered an amendment that included the large corporations making between 10 and 15 per cent, and the Senator voted against it. Having helped to kill it and made it impossible by his vote to include them, he now rises and objects to an amendment which does not include them. That is the kind of logic we have had all the time in the discussion of the bill. It is true that the pending amendment will not include those corporations making less than 15 per cent. It is true that it will relieve from taxation some 40,000 corporations which are taxed under the existing law. But the Senator from Wisconsin voted not to impose upon those corporations an excess-profits tax, and he can not now be heard to complain because the amendment does not reach those who he expressly declared by his vote should not be taxed.

But, Mr. President, the amendment does still reach and tax all corporations making more than 15 per cent. It is not true that those corporations are all corporations with a capital of $315,000 or less. That is an average, and there will be embraced within this tax many corporations of very great magnitude. Some days ago I placed in the RECORD a statement from an expert of the Treasury Department in which he gave the earnings of certain large corporations which he said were selected at random. He did not give the names, because he is not permitted to give them, but corporation No. 1 had a capital of approximately $8,000,000 and had made profits of $2,970,600. It would, of course, be reached by the amendment. Corporation No. 2 had a capital of $11,000,000 plus and had made $3,000,000 profits, and of course would be reached by the amendment. Corporation No. 3 had a capital of $4,000,000 plus and had made $1,500,000 profits, and of course would be reached by the amendment. So on through the list that he produced of those large corporations. So much for that.

The argument of my distinguished friend further is that because the excess-profits tax does not reach a few of the very large corporations that are overcapitalized, then we would not levy it at all. That is a very peculiar argument. That would be like an argument in favor of the repeal of the law against horse stealing because we could not get all the horse thieves. The right thing to do would be for the Senator to bring forward an amendment which would enable us to compel the overcapitalized corporations to pay a just amount of their burden to the Government and not escape merely through the device of overcapitalization. That can be done, and if we can get any encouragement from the other side of the aisle such an amendment will be very promptly prepared.

Before I leave the Senator from Wisconsin I wish to offer an observation upon his opening remark, which was that if the Democratic Party could get the credit for the bill it would declare it to be a good bill, by which I take it he meant to say that if the Democratic Party could get credit for the changes that have been made in the bill the Democratic Party would be content. Now, we frequently hear a man say that it was his vote that elected somebody to office, if the man was elected by only one vote. What he really means to say is that if his vote had not been added to some thousands of other votes the man would have failed by one vote.

The situation here is that the so-called bloc upon the other side of the aisle were absolutely impotent to do anything for themselves. The Democratic side was equally impotent because there was a majority upon the other side of the aisle, and the program as brought in here by what I will call, and not offensively, the standpat part of the Republican membership was going through. There had to be a rebellion, but a rebellion on the Republican side would not do any good. It did not constitute a majority of the Republican side. It was a sort of vermiform appendix that was very useful to the other side, but if a surgical operation could be performed, and we could cut it off and add it to the Democratic side, then the two together could produce some results. Whatever good has been done to the bill has been accomplished because there was a solid Democratic vote to which the vote of some Senators on the other side of the aisle being added, there were some improvements made to the bill. The unfortunate thing is——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator, in order that there may not be any debate upon that proposition, that we agree to divide the credit fifty-fifty.

Mr. REED. Oh, no!

Mr. LENROOT. If we make it seventy-five and twenty-five, is that more satisfactory?

Mr. REED. Well, we will divide it this way, that the Democratic Party made the fight and made it so hot that we converted some of you gentlemen on the other side. I do not care anything about the credit, because nobody is going to get much credit out of this bill. We simply claim the credit for having made an honest fight, and we are still making it and we would still like to have some help. We will be willing, if you will come over and help us on the excess-profits tax provision, to give you 50 per cent of the credit of that if you want it.

Now, Mr. President, just a word with reference to some arguments that were advanced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. They are very curious. It was claimed by the Senator from Connecticut that all taxes are passed on and paid by the ultimate consumer. If that is true, then no harm can come to a corporation which has to pay the tax and no embargo is placed upon business, because business does not carry the burden. If that be true, not a dollar is taken from business. Business simply adds the tax on and the ultimate consumer pays it. A discontinuance of the tax, therefore, would not benefit business a dollar. That is where the Senator's line of argument leads to.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, has the Senator from Missouri overlooked the fact that big business is prepared to quit and go into unremunerative business rather than to collect this tax from the ultimate consumer?

Mr. REED. No; I had not overlooked it, but I had not had time to get to it. I am obliged to my friend for the suggestion.

Then it is claimed by the Senator from Connecticut that all taxes are paid by the ultimate consumer, and at the same time he stood here and looked us in the eye and with a courage that was sublime and with an apparent honesty that would deceive the very elect he told us there are 103,000,000 people in the United States who do not pay any taxes at all.

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I did not state that all taxes were paid by the consumer.

Mr. REED. The Senator said they were passed on.

Mr. MCLEAN. No; I did not say that. I said that in a rising market some excess-profit taxes are passed on, and that even on a stagnant market, so far as excess-profits taxes are concerned, they were passed on where there is little competition, as I instanced the other day.

Mr. REED. What about a falling market?

Mr. MCLEAN. It is different.

Mr. REED. We have a falling market now, have we not?

Mr. MCLEAN. We have.

Mr. REED. If we have a falling market now, then, for the first time in history, the excess-profits tax gentleman will have to pay his own taxes, and the Senator from Connecticut wants to take them off at the very time he can not pass them on to the taxpayer.

Mr. MCLEAN. No; I intended to say that even on a falling market the excess-profits tax can be passed on where they are not subjected to competition.

Mr. REED. The tax can be passed on?

Mr. MCLEAN. On a falling market.

Mr. REED. It seems they can be passed on and they can not be passed on. If they are passed on, then they do not hurt the gentlemen who pay them. If they are not passed on, then the Government compels the rogue who extracts them to divide, and does not hurt the common people.

Mr. MCLEAN. If the Senator will pardon me, as I instanced the other day, oil has gone from 11 cents to 33 cents a gallon. I assumed that probably the cost of production may have doubled, may be twice what it was before, but no more than that. We have a 10 per cent consumption tax in that case, and in my judgment it is paid by those who consume the oil in this country, because there is little competition.

Mr. REED. I have not any doubt of it; but that institution makes excess profits. They are robbing us to this extent now. They will keep right on, and the only difference between the Senator and myself is that I say that they should be compelled to divide with the Government, while the Senator has said they should keep it all.

Mr. McLEAN. No; I say it is much fairer that those who consume oil should pay a small tax they can see rather than be subjected to this indirect tax.

Mr. REED. That means the Senator may be leaning toward a sales tax; but if we had the sales tax we would apply the sales tax, and this monopoly—for it must be a monopoly to control that situation—will still continue its extortion.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator said that I stood here and said that 103,000,000 people escape all taxation. I was very careful to say direct taxation.

Mr. REED. Now the Senator is changing.

Mr. McLEAN. I have not changed. The Senator misquoted me; that is all.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not understand the Senator to be now undertaking to quote his language. I did not hear it. I would not dispute the Senator's word. I understood the Senator to say they paid no tax; but he now says—and, of course, I will take his statement—that he said no direct tax.

Mr. McLEAN. I was referring to the taxes that are assessed in the pending bill.

Mr. REED. Very well, let the RECORD show. I do not think the Senator made a misstatement, and if I misheard him it makes no difference. The fact is if the taxes are passed on they do not hurt the great concern that exacts them. If they are not passed on, then that concern can be compelled to divide with the Government.

The Senator stated—and of this statement I made a memorandum, and think I am not mistaken in it—that there were 103,000,000 people who escape, as he now puts it, direct taxation, and that the rest of the taxes come from the great incomes. Yet the Senator now says that the people pay the indirect taxes, which is an indirect way of saying they pay the taxes. That is all there is to it.

What are the facts? There are 40,000,000 incomes in the United States, for everybody does not make an income. There are a lot of suckling babes who do not make incomes; they absorb incomes. So it is estimated by the Government statisticians that there are 40,000,000 incomes earned in the United States. Of course the great majority of them are small, but there are 6,000,000 taxed incomes. The excess-profits tax which I now propose will reach that class of institutions which are making abnormal profits and which, according to the doctrine of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] are passing the tax on those abnormal profits on to the people. Under those circumstances the Senator says it would be an unjust burden to compel them to pay this tax. In one breath he tells us that the tax is not paid by them at all, and in the next breath he tells us that the tax is burdensome upon great wealth, and he boasts how the Republican Party by this bill has imposed that burden upon wealth.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. McLEAN. I think a 1 per cent consumption tax would be less burdensome than a 10 per cent indirect tax would be. Under existing conditions the people pay a 10 per cent tax on oil, and under the 1 per cent tax they would not pay so much.

Mr. REED. The Senator is again discussing another question; that is, the question of a sales tax. I believe I can see symptoms of his having been gradually inoculated with that doctrine. I am not criticizing him for it. I confess that almost anything would be better than this bill in its present form.

Mr. CARAWAY rose.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will pardon me one moment, I desire to say that I agree with the Senator from Missouri to a certain extent, provided that we defeat the amendment that he continues to insist upon. I think that the bill as it came from the committee would be a very great improvement on the existing law. I think that possibly, under existing circumstances, it would be the longest step that we could take in the right direction at this time; but with the amendments which have been proposed I am rather rapidly coming to the conclusion that it would be better for the American people to be subjected to a frank, open consumption tax of one-half of 1 per cent or 1 per cent as an experiment than to continue the present exorbitant taxes. The Senator from Missouri knows that 88 per cent of the national income goes to people who receive less than $5,000. If we are to continue the policy of adding to the indirect burdens which are imposed upon that large class of small incomes, I am inclined to think it is better to be frank and open and impose a small turnover tax.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, there was some resentment shown yesterday—possibly justly so—by Senators on the other side of the Chamber when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] said they sat there as dumb as oysters and with the same intellectual expression upon their countenances. I do not know whether that is an elegant argument, but I do know that it had the same effect on the majority that stripping the shell off an oyster has on it. They began to stir. In defense of their position the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] gave three reasons why the excess-profits tax should be repealed. If he be correct, the excess-profits tax possibly should be repealed. If, however, he is mistaken in each of those propositions, I am curious to know what real reason the majority has for urging the repeal of that tax. I say this, because the Senator is presumed to have spoken for the majority. The reasons advanced by him is presumed to be the moving cause which impelled the Republican Party to relieve the profiteer of this tax.

These reasons are, the Senator from Indiana said, that an excess-profits tax drives capital out of legitimate business, stops the wheels of industry, and is accountable for the present stagnation of all business in this country and for the millions of men who walk the streets and beg for bread; that the excess-profits tax has driven investors out of industry and caused them to put their money in tax-exempt securities.

The absurdity about that argument is that at the same time business is stagnated and big industries are closing down the very lowest price ever received in peace times for Government tax-exempt securities is being realized. If big business is being destroyed in order to put its capital into tax-exempt securities, why do those tax-exempt securities not sell? We all know that, for instance, the farm loan bonds, which are as safe as the Government can make them, because they have back of them all the real wealth of the country, were not sold and could not be sold, though bearing an interest rate of 5 per cent. They could not be sold, although there were millions of farmers ready to borrow the money and to pay the interest on their loans. If big business was being closed down in order to put its money into tax-exempt securities, I ask what securities those investors are buying. Liberty bonds were going down; Federal farm loan bonds were not finding a market; State securities were not being sold; in fact, there is not a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who can point to a single tax-exempt security that was going up, indicating that there was a market for it, and that wealth was seeking it, at the time the factories were closing down and men were marching empty handed in the streets.

Mr. McLEAN. It was stated the other day that $800,000,000 of tax-exemption securities had been put upon the market this year and had been absorbed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Those figures included every kind of securities.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they only included tax-exempt securities.

Mr. CARAWAY. I mean every kind of tax-exempt securities—National, State, city, improvement bonds, and other securities of that kind. How much less business is being done this year than was done two years ago? Two years ago we collected three times that much in excess-profits tax alone. What became of that capital? It has not gone into tax-exempt securities.

Mr. McLEAN. That is because the Government confiscated it.

Mr. CARAWAY. It has not confiscated the capital; it has confiscated only a part of the excess profits which were made.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield? And if so, to whom?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator was talking about a class of tax-exempt bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not say that.

Mr. SMOOT. And he referred to those sold by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator never understood me to say that, I hope, for I do not think I said it.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator so to state.

Mr. CARAWAY. I said that tax-exempt bonds bearing 5 per cent did not find buyers.

Mr. SMOOT. Why should they when there were other bonds available drawing 6 per cent and over?

Mr. CARAWAY. What bonds of this character were being sold bearing 6 per cent and over?

Mr. SMOOT. For instance, the bonds of the city of Knoxville, Tenn., bearing 6 per cent.

Mr. CARAWAY. How much was the issue?

Mr. SMOOT. On October 15 there were $12,000 of bonds of that city sold.

Mr. CARAWAY. The sale of $12,000 of bonds would not absorb a great deal of capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Those bonds were due October 1, 1923. Then there were $34,000 of bonds of the city of Knoxville, Tenn., due October 1, 1924, drawing 6 per cent interest.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator know the reason why those bonds had to pay 6 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Because they could not sell them for any less.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the wealth of the country was going into tax-exempt bonds, why could they not have been sold for less?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of my taking the time of the Senate to answer that question. I presume if the Senator had ever been in business he would not have asked such a question.

Mr. CARAWAY. I have never been in business of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure of that——

Mr. CARAWAY. I am also sure.

Mr. SMOOT. Because the Senator's answer so indicates.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no argument to be made about that, for the very fact that tax-exempt securities in order to be sold had to be issued bearing rates of interest higher than had been paid in 20 years before shows that we were not driving capital out of business into tax-exempt securities.

Mr. SMOOT. The year 1924 is not 20 years away, and the bonds of Knoxville, Tenn., as I told the Senator, are due on October 1, 1924.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator did not tell me when they were issued.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the RECORD he will find that I not only told him as to the $12,000 of bonds due on October 1, 1923, which were sold, but as to the 34,000 bonds of the city of Knoxville of the issue of October 1, 1924, which were sold.

Mr. CARAWAY. When were those bonds sold?

Mr. SMOOT. I have the report on them here, and I will tell the Senator when they were sold.

Mr. CARAWAY. Were they sold within the last year?

Mr. SMOOT. They were sold on October 15 of this year.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course, as I have said, it is necessary to pay higher rates of interest to sell such bonds now.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator please tell me what it was he said?

Mr. SMOOT. I said that the last remark of the Senator from Arkansas was exactly what I had said; there can be no question about that.

Mr. REED. Exactly what the Senator from Utah is doing is proving the case of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the Senator from Missouri does not understand what the Senator from Arkansas was saying.

Mr. CARAWAY. The next argument was that the excess-profits tax was passed on to the consumer. In that connection I am going to say, with all due deference, that if both of those statements seem sound arguments to Senators on the other side of the Chamber, if, in the first place, an excess-profits tax when levied drives capital out of business, and if, in the next place, the excess-profits tax is not paid by business at all, but is passed on to the consumer—if such statements impress Senators on the other side as sound, I think my friend from Missouri was too severe on the oyster when he said that there was some comparison between the arguments used on the other side and the appearance of an oyster; because nobody but an oyster could be fooled by that kind of an argument. [Laughter.] Everybody knows that if the tax can be passed on, it does not drive capital out of business by assessing such a tax. The Senator from Utah would admit that I rather imagine. A man who is willing to make an excess profit is not going to find himself so filled with compassion for the long-suffering people that he will not longer be willing to make such a profit, even though he can pass it on to the people. So I know positively that one or the other of those statements can not be true. Capital is not driven out of business by the excess-profits tax if capital is passing that tax on to the consumer. That accounts for two of the arguments which have been made in support of the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

The other argument was—and it closely followed the other two—that the excess-profits tax drives capital into nontaxable securities. The answer is that it is necessary to pay a higher rate of interest on such securities in order to get a market for them, which shows that people are not seeking that kind of an investment. There is no Senator on the other side of the Chamber who can name a single concern that was paying the excess-profits tax that has or is going to shut up shop and refuse to pay the tax and put its money in a nontax-bearing security. If any man who was making an excess profit, rather than to pay it, puts his money into a nontaxable security that pays him 5 or 5½ per cent, or even 6 per cent if he had bought the $12,500 of Knoxville, Tenn., securities—if he would do that when he was getting more than 10 per cent absolutely tax free, that man would have gone out of business anyway, because there would have been a guardian appointed for him.

Mr. McLEAN. Who on this side of the Chamber has said that the excess-profits tax was driving the men interested in that particular line of business to invest their money in nontaxable securities?

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator whether he seriously contends that it has not been said over there that you were driving capital out of business with excess-profits taxes, and driving it into nontaxable securities?

Mr. McLEAN. Not those that are paying an excess-profits tax now. I do not think anyone has said that that capital was going into nontaxable securities.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is not true, then? You are not driving people out of business with excess-profits taxes?

Mr. McLEAN. I did not say that.

Mr. CARAWAY. What does the Senator say?

Mr. McLEAN. I have not said that they are going out of business and investing their capital in nontaxable securities.

Mr. CARAWAY. What are they investing it in?

Mr. McLEAN. They are leaving it where it is, and charging the excess profits to the consumer, multiplied by about five in some instances.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought the Senator said a while ago that on a falling market they could not do that, and that this was a falling market.

Mr. McLEAN. I said that the men who are making excess profits, lacking competition, can continue to do it.

Mr. CARAWAY. And you want to relieve them of their tax?

Mr. McLEAN. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. The only ones who can do it are those who, without competition, are unconscionably making excess profits; are they not?

Mr. McLEAN. I say that if you relieve them of some of this tax, they will not have the excuse for multiplying it by five and adding it to prices.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh! The Senator wants to forgive them that tax so that their hearts will be softened, and they will quit collecting excess profits? That is one argument, then, that we have got fixed—that the only reason why you want to relieve these taxpayers is to soften their hearts so that they will not charge the people such exorbitant profits for their merchandise. If the Senator will point out to me just one man who will be affected in that way, I am going to believe that I am wrong in all my contentions and vote for the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know what other Members on this side of the Chamber have said. In my brief discussion of the subject the other day I gave my reasons for the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was the Senator's reason?

Mr. McLEAN. There are many.

Mr. CARAWAY. Just one of them?

Mr. McLEAN. In the first place, it is brutally unjust to a small stockholder in some instances.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question right there.

Mr. McLEAN. No; let me explain. The Senator has asked me to explain, and now I should like the opportunity, if he will permit me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why, of course; I am glad to hear one explanation.

Mr. McLEAN. There are a great many concerns conservatively capitalized that pay, we will say, 20 per cent dividends. Here is a man who leaves a hundred shares of stock in a corporation of that kind to his wife. It is all she has. She will receive an income of $2,000 a year from that 100 shares of stock; but it is in a corporation that is subject to the excess-profits tax. Where there is competition and it can not be carried to prices, we first take out 8 per cent in dividends. On the remaining 12 per cent a 20 per cent excess-profits tax must be paid before her dividend comes to her.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let us see. She gets 8 per cent, and then she gets a certain exemption from the corporation, amounting to enough to give her about 10 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. She does not get any exemption.

Mr. CARAWAY. The corporation gets it before the excess-profits tax is paid.

Mr. McLEAN. I am accounting for that.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator is accounting for the 8 per cent only?

Mr. McLEAN. The 8 per cent.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then there is a flat exemption.

Mr. McLEAN. To be sure. This 12 per cent pays an excess-profits tax. Then on the balance of that there is a 10 per cent corporation tax, and she pays a tax of three hundred and thirty-odd dollars on that income of $2,000.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does he not know that there is a flat exemption and then the 8 per cent exemption on a corporation?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then why does the Senator ignore that in his statement?

Mr. McLEAN. When you figure it out you will find that the tax that that woman pays on $2,000 amounts to over $300.

Mr. CARAWAY. That was not what I asked the Senator. Why does he ignore the fact that the corporation has its flat exemption and then its 8 per cent exemption?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not ignore that. I am allowing that.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the Senator's calculation—8 and 12 are 20—he says there is 12 per cent that pays the excess-profits tax. That does not happen to be true, because there is a flat exemption in addition to the 8 per cent exemption. Let me ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator think that profiteering is all right, providing there is not a large capital invested, and that it becomes a crime only when a large corporation is involved?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I do not think that profiteering is all right; but I will say to the Senator that you can not control monopoly by confiscating capital. You have got to take the profiteer and punish him. If you do it by confiscating capital and removing the opportunity to make legitimate profits, you are treading the path that Russia has trod.

Mr. CARAWAY. Where will the capital go?

Mr. McLEAN. What capital?

Mr. CARAWAY. The capital that you are driving out of industry with this confiscation through the excess-profits tax. Where will it go?

Mr. McLEAN. I did not say that you were driving the excess-profits men out of business. You are confiscating incomes which would go into business.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then you simply do not want to tax the small corporation? Is that it?

Mr. McLEAN. Because it is brutally unjust to the small stockholder; that is one reason. Another reason is because it invites the watering of capital, increases of capital, and enormous salaries. That is another reason, and there are several other reasons. A tax on an excess profit, as I have tried to say to the Senator, is reflected in a way that has resulted in a confiscation of incomes that would soon become capital that is serious.

Mr. CARAWAY. Now, let me ask the Senator this question: He said just a minute ago, as I understood, that the excess-profits tax would be passed on to the consumer, and now he says that it is brutally unjust to take it out of the corporation. If the corporation passes it on, where does the brutal injustice to the corporation come in?

Mr. McLEAN. I did not say that it was brutally unjust to the corporation. I said it was brutally unjust to the small stockholder.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; but if the small stockholder's tax is passed on to the consumer, where does the brutal injustice to the small stockholder come in?

Mr. McLEAN. Because it is taken from the dividend, if there is competition, and can not be passed to prices.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the dividend has been increased by reason of the fact that they had made an excess profit and passed the tax on to the consumer.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; in some instances, where there is no competition.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then, where is the brutality to the small stockholder?

Mr. McLEAN. Because the small stockholder must lose where the tax can not be passed on.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who does get that part of it, then?

Mr. McLEAN. What part?

Mr. CARAWAY. That part that the small stockholder does not get. Who gets that?

Mr. McLEAN. The Government gets the tax that the small stockholder loses.

Mr. CARAWAY. All right. I think that ought to be entirely clear, but I do not understand it.

Mr. McLEAN. I see that the Senator does not.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is a brutal process to make an excess profit and have the Government take a part of it, but it is entirely proper to pass it all on to the public.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator seems to think that it is the opinion of all the Members on this side of the Chamber that excess profits——

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think that any two of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber have the same opinion, but they all vote alike.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not a fair statement, because the Senator did not even wait until I had made my statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg the Senators' pardon. I am perfectly willing to have him complete his statement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to hear this illuminating discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator seems to think that it has been argued by this side of the Chamber that the imposition of the excess-profits tax drives capital out of business and that that capital goes into tax-exempt securities. I have never said that. I have never claimed it.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator from Utah heard the Senator from Indiana say that yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never claimed it. I have claimed, however, that the higher brackets of the income tax do that, and I have not any doubt in the world but that they do.

Mr. CARAWAY. This does not affect the higher brackets of the income tax.

Mr. SMOOT. But I have never made the statement that the Senator tried to attribute to this side of the Chamber. If the Senator will take the time to read the speech that I delivered here on October 11——

Mr. CARAWAY. I did the Senator the honor to listen to it.

Mr. SMOOT. He will find that I never made any such statement as that; but I do claim that the high brackets of the income tax drive the capital that no doubt would go into business into tax-exempt securities, and I do not think there is any doubt at all about it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Anyway, then, the Senator repudiates the statement of the Senator from Indiana yesterday that this excess-profits tax drove money out of industry. I am glad to know that, because I did not think anybody ought to have accepted it.

Does the Senator from Idaho wish to ask me a question?

Mr. BORAH. I am going to say that I do not know that the Senator from Utah has ever made the suggestion—of course, if he says he has not, he has not—but my understanding was that one of the principal arguments against the excess-profits tax was that it drove capital out of business.

Mr. CARAWAY. And this is the first time it has been repudiated on the other side of the Chamber to my knowledge. I do not doubt that the Senator from Utah has entertained the view all the time that he says he has entertained; I will believe anything he says about it; but the Senator has offered a consumption tax in the way of a sales tax, and I think he is absolutely consistent in his attitude. Therefore the statement I made that the argument of the Senator from Indiana was not any great reflection upon the intelligence of the oyster does not apply at all to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course that statement had no influence upon me in stating what I had to say. It may apply to me just as much or more than to anybody else on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am sure the Senator from Missouri did not mean to make that application to the Senator from Utah, because he was talking about those folks who would not defend the bill.

I am sorry to have interrupted the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator did not interrupt me. I am anxious now to get back to the basic proposition of excluding from the bill the excess-profits tax. I had understood from the beginning that it was because it was driving capital out of business, and therefore putting business into such a condition that it could not employ labor, thereby putting labor upon the road to beg.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that he did not listen attentively to the statement of the Senator from Connecticut. He says that it neither drives capital out of business nor is passed on, but that it is brutally unfair.

Mr. BORAH. I think all these taxes are becoming brutal because of the excessive amount of expenditure which the National Government is making; but it is absolutely certain that we can not relieve people from taxation until we cut down expenditures, and somebody will have to be brutalized.

Mr. CARAWAY. But I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that a tax is never brutal when levied on anybody except the man who is making excess profits, because even the Senator from Connecticut admits that. Though I frankly understood him to say at first that 103,000,000 people paid no taxes, he now says they pay no direct taxes but they pay an indirect tax. He sheds no tears, however, over the 103,000,000 people who are indirectly taxed and has no feeling of indignation in behalf of any taxpayer except the person who owns stock in a corporation that makes an excess-profits tax. I say this because he has not offered any relief or suggestion of relief to anybody else but these particular people, but when they cry out for help it stirs his New England fighting blood.

Either one of two things is true, either the excess-profits tax is paid by the unconscionable profiteer who extracts it wrongfully from the people or it is passed on. If it is paid by the man who takes an exorbitant profit, he ought to be compelled to give it up, and if it is passed on it does not drive capital out of business. I want to say to you now that the makers of excess profits would not be here clamoring for its repeal if they could pass it on. The very best evidence on earth that a tax can not be passed on is that the man who pays it commences to cry out for relief from it.

Therefore I am persuaded that the excess-profits tax is borne more largely by the man who in the first place pays it than nearly any other tax you can levy, and if the time has come when we believe as a body of legislators that we ought to encourage profiteering by saying that the profiteers should not be compelled to pay in the way of a tax any share of what they may extract from the people because it is brutal, because it outrages their feelings, then the people ought to know it. The people ought to know they are simply relieving the profiteer by this repeal of the excess-profits tax.

The Senator from Indiana suggested, and the suggestion has been followed up, that two Secretaries of the Treasury recommended this repeal of the excess-profits tax—that is, Secretary GLASS and Secretary Houston—and that both are Democrats. Of course, one is a Democrat, but no one knows what Secretary Houston is, and never did know. He does not know himself.

Then the Senator from Indiana said that our party platform advocated the repeal of the excess-profits tax. There is not a line in that party platform that even intimates that. He then said that our party candidate advocated it. I am sure I do not recall, but, if he did, the fact that he got beaten 7,000,000 votes would indicate that the people did not agree with him. Either one of two things about that argument strikes me as pertinent. You can not say in one breath that they agree with you in your advocacy of the repeal of the excess-profits tax and punish us for advocating the same thing. But it may be that they believed that if Cox said he was in favor of repealing the excess-profits tax he meant it, and if elected would do what he could to have it repealed. On the other hand, they thought the Republicans would not do it, and therefore they voted for you and voted against us. I think they would be warranted in reaching that conclusion by past experienecs in dealing with the two parties.

But it seemed that the people overlooked the fact that the Republicans had an outstanding agreement to repeal this excess-profits tax which they were committed to keep, and therefore are going to repeal the excess-profits tax.

You can not say, in view of what now is claimed on the other side, that you are doing it in the interest of the people or that you are doing it in the interest of business, because just now the Republican leaders there say the tax is not passed on and therefore the people do not suffer, and the other Republican leaders claim it does not drive capital out of business, and if you are not relieving either the people or legitimate business of this burden of the excess-profits tax, in whose interest do you repeal it. It is not in the interest of legitimate business, because you have just repudiated the idea that it drives capital out of legitimate business, and you have likewise repudiated the idea that it could be passed on. You repeal it, then, in the interest of whom? You do not repeal it in the interest either of the people or of legitimate business, then you must repeal it in the interest of the profiteer and no one else.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is a business that is conducted upon a small, conservative capital, a 20 per cent dividend may not be profiteering.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the Senator this question. Thirty-seven States of these United States have said that if you, as a money lender, demand or receive more than 10 per cent you are a usurer, and that you shall be punished by the forfeiture of your interest and investment. Either those 37 States are wrong in their idea of what ought to be a fair return for money or the Senator is mistaken when he says that 30 per cent is a legitimate profit.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course, that involves another question, the Senator knows, entirely different from this; and I do not propose to go into the discussion of that. What I say is that a company that is capitalized at a hundred thousand dollars may make 20 per cent or 30 per cent and it may be a reasonable return on the investment.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it is capitalized at a hundred thousand dollars, has a hundred thousand dollars invested in it, the Senator thinks that 30 per cent, or $30,000, is a reasonable return on the investment of a hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. McLEAN. It may be. That hundred thousand dollars may in the course of years have accumulated additional capital legitimately.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, yes; it is in computing the profits.

Mr. CARAWAY. All the invested capital is taken into consideration in computing excess profits. The Senator is unhappy in his suggestion.

Mr. McLEAN. That is so in theory.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the Senator is wrong about that. But I have taken more time of the Senate than I intended to take. I merely wanted to call attention to the unreasonableness of the position that capital is driven out of business by an excess-profits tax and that at the same time the excess-profits tax is passed on. The two propositions not being true, I merely rose to ask what the real reason was for the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and I think we got that in the answer of the Senator from Connecticut that it was a brutal tax; that it was brutal to make a man pay an excess-profits tax where he did not make over 30 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. I am referring to the small stockholder of that company; do not misunderstand me.

Mr. CARAWAY. What difference does it make if a widow has a hundred thousand dollars invested in a corporation that has $10,000,000 capital stock, or has the same amount invested in a small corporation, or has a mortgage on her neighbor's farm, or has her money loaned to a trader, a stock grower, or a wheat grower? It is a question of the return, not of the size of the corporation. We are not trying to penalize corporations because their capital stock is large.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator misunderstands my question.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not.

Mr. McLEAN. I said a widow, or any other person holding stock in a company which pays an excess-profits tax, might hold a very small proportion of the stock, say a hundred shares.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course the tax would be computed on whatever the 100 shares were worth, and if she is getting 30 per cent on it, she ought not to complain if she is compelled to pay a tax. If she does not make that much, if the gentleman's argument is sound, we ought to vote her a bounty because her investment happened to be in a corporation which did not make excess profits. The morality of the thing would be just the same. You are taking from somebody to make up the deficit caused by the fact that the corporation making excess profits does not pay it, because somebody has to pay it as long as we expend the money. As long as taxes have to be collected, somebody has to pay them, and if you relieve the excess-profits taker of $450,000,000, you have to go into the pocket of somebody else who is not making excess profits to get it. That is all. As between the two, it seems to be the attitude of the Senator from Connecticut that he would rather take it from the man who has not than from the man who has. There is where we differ.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am ready to vote, if the other side is ready to vote on it now, and then I will speak on the next amendment.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 131, after line 3, insert the following words:

For the calendar year 1922, and for each calendar year thereafter, excess-profits taxes shall be levied as follows: Twenty per cent of the net income in excess of 15 per cent and not in excess of 50 per cent of the invested capital, and 40 per cent of the excess over 50 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is engaged in a committee hearing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is detained on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment to the amendment, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri before the vote is taken what his amendment if enacted into law will yield to the Government in the way of revenue?

Mr. REED. The estimates of experts are that it will yield $200,000,000 per annum. A vote against this amendment is a vote to leave $200,000,000 per annum in the hands of corporations which make more than 15 per cent. I am ready to vote.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

So Mr. REED's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

For the calendar year 1922, and for each calendar year thereafter, excess-profits taxes shall be levied as follows: Twenty per cent of the net income in excess of 50 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, all I desire to say on the amendment is that it takes one dollar out of five after a corporation has made 50 per cent net. It will realize to the Government $40,000,000. It is not what we ought to have, but I am desirous of ascertaining whether it is the settled policy of the Senate to levy no taxes upon excess profits, however great. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer as on the former vote, I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). On account of my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is unavoidably absent, I am not at liberty to vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. Making the same announcement as heretofore in reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Making the same announcement as I previously made with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I am unable to obtain a transfer of that pair and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KING. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. Not being able to obtain a transfer, I am compelled to withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to announce that my colleague, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—33.

So Mr. REED's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. I give notice that I reserve for separate votes in the Senate the two amendments to the committee amendment which have just been defeated—the amendment last voted on and the one preceding it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not necessary for the Senator from Missouri to make that reservation.

Mr. REED. I desire to make the reservation, however, none the less.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course I do not agree with any idea that the last great war was a rich man's war and a poor man's fight. I do not think it was that in Belgium, in France, in Great Britain, in Canada, or in the United States. I think it was the entire people's fight for the preservation of civilization and modern democracy against autocracy and militarism. But in one respect the Senator from Wisconsin is eminently right.

Mr. President, there are a few truisms that are still publicly pronounceable, even in a country which has lately lost its ideals, as this country has. One of them is that a brave man never attempts to escape the natural consequences of his own act. Nor does a brave nation seek that sort of escape. We declared this war, we made this war, rich and poor, Democrats and Republicans. We, the people of this country, of France, and of Great Britain, met at the forefront of the dividing boundaries between democracy and civilization on one side and autocracy and militarism on the other, with our sons and with our money, the attack being made upon the world.

It is a cowardly thing to try to transfer the burden to posterity. Posterity did not make the war. We ought to pay the very utmost of it that we can. The Nation ought to stand like a man responsible for his own acts. To transfer to our children and our grandchildren the consequences of our laudable, praiseworthy, and heroic act is still a matter of cowardice, and I for one am not willing to do it.

Now, this excess-profits tax is a tax upon those who are able to pay it, and it is more than any other tax in the bill a tax which it would be cowardly to repeal, a tax which it would be cowardly for the men who pay it to attempt to escape.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the time has come for the taking of a vote on pending amendments to the excess-profits tax sections of the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to offer an amendment for the sake of an explanation. I move to strike out the figures "1921," in line 18, page 130, and to insert in lieu thereof "1921 and 1922."

I have taken the time of the Senate to try to have this proposition amended. We are now forced to vote. I think further efforts to amend are useless. When we vote in favor of the text as offered by the committee we will be voting to keep the present excess-profits tax on until next December, and then it will end. But if we should vote against it we would vote to end the excess-profits tax now. So I suppose in order to keep it until next December we shall be obliged to vote for the text, but as I vote for that text I wish the reason why I am doing so to be understood. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment which I just offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALDER in the chair.) The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance is at the top of page 130, to strike out the words "Title III. Excess-profits tax repeal," and to insert:

Title III.—War-profits and excess-profits tax for 1921.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is on page 130, after line 3, to strike out:

SEC. 301 (a). Title III of the revenue act of 1918 is repealed, to take effect January 1, 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is on page 130, after line 5, to insert:

PART I.—GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 300. That when used in this title the terms "taxable year," "fiscal year," "personal service corporation," "foreign trade corporation," "paid or accrued," and "dividends" shall have the same meaning as provided for the purposes of income tax in sections 200 and 201.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee have an amendment to perfect the amendment just read. I should like to have it acted on at this time. In line 9, page 130, I move to strike out the words "foreign-trade corporation," the comma, and the quotation marks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 130, line 9, strike out the quotation marks and the words "foreign-trade corporation."

Mr. REED. Why?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is to conform to the amendment adopted by the Senate, on page 5, when we struck out the definition of foreign traders and foreign-trade corporations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the same amendment, on page 140, in line 1, to strike out the words "or a foreign-trade corporation," so that it will read:

(b) In the case of a foreign corporation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I inquire how much of the text is embraced in the amendment to part 1?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Part 1, section 300.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the entire part?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The entire part 1. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 130, after line 12, to insert:

PART II.—IMPOSITION OF TAX.

SEC. 301. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by Title III of the revenue act of 1918, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the calendar year 1921 upon the net income of every corporation (except corporations taxable under subdivision (b) of this section) a tax equal to the sum of the following:

FIRST BRACKET.

Twenty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under section 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.

Forty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

(b) For the calendar year 1921 there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation which derives in such a year a net income of more than $10,000 from any Government contract or contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, a tax equal to the sum of the following:

(1) Such a portion of a tax computed at the rates specified in subdivision (a) of section 301 of the revenue act of 1918, as the part of the net income attributable to such Government contract or contracts bears to the entire net income. In computing such tax the excess-profits credit and the war-profits credit which would be applicable to such calendar year under the revenue act of 1918 if it had been continued in force, shall be used;

(2) Such a portion of a tax computed at the rates specified in subdivision (a) of this section as the part of the net income not attributable to such Government contract or contracts bears to the entire net income.

For the purpose of determining the part of the net income attributable to such Government contract or contracts, the proper apportionment and allocation of the deductions with respect to gross income derived from such Government contract or contracts and from other sources, respectively, shall be determined under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

(d) In any case where the full amount of the excess-profits credit is not allowed under the first bracket of subdivision (a), by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital, the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the second bracket.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 132, after line 16, to insert:

SEC. 302. That the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of section 301 shall in no case be more than 20 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $3,000 and not in excess of $20,000, plus 40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of $20,000; and the limitations imposed by section 302 of the revenue act of 1918 (upon taxes computed under subdivision (c) of section 301 of that act) are hereby made applicable to taxes computed under subdivision (b) of section 301 of this act. Nothing in this section shall be construed in such manner as to increase the tax imposed by section 301 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 133, after line 3, to insert:

SEC. 303. That if part of the net income of a corporation is derived (1) from a trade or business (or a branch of a trade or business) in which the employment of capital is necessary, and (2) a part (constituting not less than 30 per cent of its total net income) is derived from a separate trade or business (or a distinctly separate branch of the trade or business) which if constituting the sole trade or business would bring it within the class of "personal service corporations," then (under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary) the tax upon the first part of such net income shall be separately computed (allowing in such computation only the same proportionate part of the credits authorized in section 312), and the tax upon the second part shall be the same percentage thereof as the tax so computed upon the first part is of such first part: Provided, That the tax upon such second part shall in no case be less than 20 per cent thereof, unless the tax upon the entire net income, if computed without benefit of this section, would constitute less than 20 per cent of such entire net income, in which event the tax shall be determined upon the entire net income, without reference to this section, as other taxes are determined under this title. The total tax computed under this section shall be subject to the limitations provided in section 302.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 134, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 304. (a) That the corporations enumerated in section 231 shall, to the extent that they are exempt from income tax under Title II, be exempt from taxation under this title.

(b) Any corporation whose net income for the taxable year is less than $3,000 shall be exempt from taxation under this title.

(c) In the case of any corporation engaged in the mining of gold, the portion of the net income derived from the mining of gold shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title, and the tax on the remaining portion of the net income shall be the same proportion of a tax computed within the benefit of this subdivision which such remaining portion of the net income bears to the entire net income.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer an amendment to that section, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 134, after the word "title," in line 18, insert the following words after the comma:

Or any tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917 and assessed but remaining unpaid,

So as to make the paragraph read:

(c) In the case of any corporation engaged in the mining of gold, the portion of the net income derived from the mining of gold shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title, or any tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917 and assessed but remaining unpaid, and the tax on the remaining portion of the net income shall be the same proportion of a tax computed without the benefit of this subdivision which such remaining portion of the net income bears to the entire net income.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I simply wish to state that the principle of the clause under consideration and recognized in this bill was recognized in the act of 1918, but appears to have been overlooked in the act of 1917, namely, that gold mining corporations which could not take advantage of the general rise in prices, the price being fixed absolutely at $20 per annum, were not of that class against which the excess-profits tax was intended to apply.

In this connection I should like to offer and have printed in the RECORD an argument by former Senator Thomas, of Colorado, in support of the amendment. I also desire to submit for the RECORD two very illuminative tables showing the reduction in the production of gold in this country until it has fallen considerably below even that consumed in the arts, so that the quantity for monetary uses is invaded annually for use in the arts.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Brief supporting a proposed amendment to clause (c), section 304, of H. R. 8745, as amended, so that the same shall read:

"In the case of any corporation engaged in the mining of gold, the portion of the net income derived from the mining of gold shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this title, or any tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917, and assessed but remaining unpaid, and the tax on the remaining portion of the net income shall be the proportion of the tax computed without the benefit of this subdivision, which such remaining portion of the net income bears to the entire income."

Section 304, clause (c), of the bill is identical with the same clause and section of the revenue act of 1918 and is retained in the bill to safeguard the revenues for the year 1921. The proposed amendment is contained in the clause which appears in italic letters.

The purpose is to incorporate the exemption of the revenue act of 1918 into the revenue act of 1917 for the relief of those corporations engaged in the mining of gold which have been assessed for but which have not paid excess-profit taxes for the year 1917.

REASON FOR THE EXEMPTION.

Under the theory of the excess-profits title of the act these profits must arise from the production, manufacture of, or traffic in commodities whose prices respond to the laws of supply and demand. They imply a return to the producer or dealer, or both, in excess of a fixed or normal gain and primarily due to war conditions. But gold is not a commodity. It is the standard of values for commodities. Its market price is therefore fixed by law. That price is and must be arbitrary and inflexible. When measured in terms of money, it is unaffected by conditions influencing the price of commodities. The quantity produced or the cost of production is immaterial. This is true not alone of the United States but of all other countries. That price is a little more than $20 per ounce.

Gold is therefore sui generis. A mine abundantly supplied with gold-bearing ores, or ores readily yielding to treatment, will probably prove more profitable to its owners than one containing smaller deposits or one whose ores are more refractory. But this is due entirely to physical differences, for the market price of the output of both mines is always the same. When these conditions were called to the attention of the Senate Finance Committee in 1918 it unanimously agreed to the exemption, and paragraph (c) of section 314 was inserted into the bill. It was unanimously accepted by the Senate and met with no objection either in the House or in the conference committee.

did not make this exemption because the need for it was not noted during its consideration. It is obvious that had this been done corporations mining gold would have been excluded from Title II of that act. And the failure of the Sixty-fifth Congress to insert the paragraph in that act was a palpable oversight. For if corporations mining gold should not be subjected to an excess-profits tax upon their profits of 1918 and succeeding years a fortiori should they be relieved from its operation in 1917 where they have not paid but are asking to be relieved from the exaction.

The gold-mining industry has suffered unduly from the changed conditions of labor and material due to the recent war. The cyanides used for leaching the metal from the ore were exported from Germany. After the blockade they were manufactured here, but at an enormously enhanced price to the consumer. Powder, tools, candles, machinery, etc., were then much more than doubled, as were the wages of the miners. And this high level of cost of production is still maintained, with no prospect of an early change. But the market price of the product was always the same.

Other metals responded to the increased demand. The price for some of them soared to the clouds, thus making increased cost of mining and ore treatment comparatively unimportant. The gold miner among all the producers of the continent had no alternative but to continue his development and take chances upon the elimination of his profit or shut down. Most of them eventually did the latter. Very few persisted in going ahead, and very few of these realized much if any profit. These few are certainly entitled to consideration, especially as the assessments made against them are based upon profits calculated upon arbitrary valuations of the mine, out of all proportion to their actual value. Hence the profits forming the basis of the assessments are not real but fictitious. With this phase of the gold miners' case the amendment does not deal. It is not out of place, however, to assert that the relief to be obtained by the proposed amendment relates to assessments which can not be justified by the revenue act of 1917 properly construed and applied.

EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT ON THE REVENUES.

Due to the destructive effect of war upon costs of production in the gold-mining industry, the excess-profits tax of 1917 has not affected half a dozen companies engaged exclusively in gold production. I personally know of but one. There may be others, but their number is extremely limited. I am entirely within bounds in asserting that the amendment will affect not to exceed $500,000 of disputed revenue.

Appended is a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury showing the amount of excess-profit tax realized from corporations mining gold under the revenue act of 1917. It will be noted that the statement deals chiefly with companies whose product consists of gold and other metals as well. Hence the sum total of the tax assessed, whether collected or delinquent, affords no standard for accurately determining the operation of the proposed amendment. But it is less than $500,000.

Since gold is not a commodity, the mining of it is not and can not be made a protected industry. It therefore enjoys no governmental privilege unless the stabilization of the product at a fixed price can be called one. No one conversant with the difficulties of its mining and treatment will deem it so. Indeed, at present it is a serious disadvantage, since the actual value as measured in commodities of gold mined would but for the price restriction be realized by the producer. The world sorely needs all that can be taken from the earth, and the industry should not be handicapped even for a single year by the burden of an unnatural and preposterous tax.

C. S. THOMAS.

LETTER OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY TO SENATOR PITTMAN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 31, 1921.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Pursuant to your request, I have the honor to submit below data with reference to corporations engaged in gold mining during the taxable year 1917:

Number of corporations against which excess-profits tax was assessed or is assessable		20
Amount of excess-profits tax assessed against the 20 corporations		$950,337.27
Pending assessment, additional tax uncovered through audit of one of the 20 corporations		$22,372.24
Total amount assessed or assessable		$972,709.51
Less:
Two claims for abatement filed and still pending, covering excess-profits tax of	$421,613.34
Pending assessment, additional tax, as noted above	22,372.24
Net amount assessed after deducting total amount of abatement claims filed		$528,723.93

It is impossible to state that the amount $528,723.93 has been paid without taking the matter up with the collectors of internal revenue of the various districts and having them check back their records relating to the various corporations against which assessments have been made.

Your attention is called to the fact that some of these corporations were not engaged in gold mining only and that the taxes were assessed against the total net income as returned which included in some cases revenue from sources such as silver, lead, zinc, etc.

In the cases of some of these corporations, valuations of the properties and depletion have not been finally determined, and the cases have not as yet received a final intensive audit.

If you desire to take up this matter further with me, consideration would be expedited by referring to IT:SA:NR:A:LK.

Sincerely, yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 137, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 326. (a) That as used in this title the term "invested capital" for any year means (except as provided in subdivisions (b) and (c) of this section):

(1) Actual cash bona fide paid in for stock or shares;

(2) Actual cash value of tangible property, other than cash, bona fide paid in for stock or shares, at the time of such payment, but in no case to exceed the par value of the original stock or shares specifically issued therefor, unless the actual cash value of such tangible property at the time paid in is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner to have been clearly and substantially in excess of such par value, in which case such excess shall be treated as paid-in surplus: Provided, That the commissioner shall keep a record of all cases in which tangible property is included in invested capital at a value in excess of the stock or shares issued therefor, containing the name and address of each taxpayer, the business in which engaged, the amount of invested capital and net income shown by the return, the value of the tangible property at the time paid in, the par value of the stock or shares specifically issued therefor, and the amount included under this paragraph as paid-in surplus. The commissioner shall furnish a copy of such record and other detailed information with respect to such cases when required by resolution of either House of Congress, without regard to the restrictions contained in section 257;

(3) Paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits; not including surplus and undivided profits earned during the year;

(4) Intangible property bona fide paid in for stock or shares prior to March 3, 1917, in an amount not exceeding (a) the actual cash value of such property at the time paid in, (b) the par value of the stock or shares issued therefor, or (c) in the aggregate 25 per cent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding on March 3, 1917, whichever is lowest;

(5) Intangible property bona fide paid in for stock or shares on or after March 3, 1917, in an amount not exceeding (a) the actual cash value of such property at the time paid in, (b) the par value of the stock or shares issued therefor, or (c) in the aggregate 25 per cent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding at the beginning of the taxable year, whichever is lowest: Provided, That in no case shall the total amount included under paragraphs (4) and (5) exceed in the aggregate 25 per cent of the par value of the total stock or shares of the corporation outstanding at the beginning of the taxable year; but

(b) As used in this title the term "invested capital" does not include borrowed capital.

(c) There shall be deducted from invested capital as above defined a percentage thereof equal to the percentage which the amount of inadmissible assets is of the amount of admissible and inadmissible assets held during the taxable year.

(d) The invested capital for any period shall be the average invested capital for such period, but in the case of a corporation making a return for a fractional part of a year, it shall be the same fractional part of such average invested capital.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 139, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 327. That in the following cases the tax shall be determined as provided in section 328:

(a) Where the commissioner is unable to determine the invested capital as provided in section 326;

(b) In the case of a foreign corporation or a foreign trade corporation;

(c) Where a mixed aggregate of tangible property and intangible property has been paid in for stock or for stock and bonds and the commissioner is unable satisfactorily to determine the respective values of the several classes of property at the time of payment, or to distinguish the classes of property paid in for stock and for bonds, respectively;

(d) Where upon application by the corporation the commissioner finds and so declares of record that the tax if determined without benefit of this section would, owing to abnormal conditions affecting the capital or income of the corporation, work upon the corporation an exceptional hardship evidenced by gross disproportion between the tax computed without benefit of this section and the tax computed by reference to the representative corporations specified in section 328. This subdivision shall not apply to any case (1) in which the tax (computed without benefit of this section) is high merely because the corporation earned within the taxable year a high rate of profit upon a normal invested capital, nor (2) in which 50 per cent or more of the gross income of the corporation for the taxable year (computed under section 233 of Title II) consists of gains, profits, commissions, or other income derived on a cost-plus basis from a Government contract or contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the section as amended.

The section as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 141, after line 6, to insert:

SEC. 328. (a) That in the cases specified in section 327 the tax shall be the amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for the taxable year as the average tax of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business bears to their average net income (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for such year. In the case of a foreign corporation the tax shall be computed without deducting the specific exemption of $3,000 either for the taxpayer or the representative corporations.

In computing the tax under this section the commissioner shall compare the taxpayer only with representative corporations whose invested capital can be satisfactorily determined under section 326 and which are, as nearly as may be, similarly circumstanced with respect to gross income, net income, profits per unit of business transacted and capital employed, the amount and rate of war profits or excess profits, and all other relevant facts and circumstances.

(b) For the purposes of subdivision (a) the ratios between the average tax and the average net income of representative corporations shall be determined by the commissioner, in accordance with regulations prescribed by him, with the approval of the Secretary.

(c) The commissioner shall keep a record of all cases in which the tax is determined in the manner prescribed in subdivision (a), containing the name and address of each taxpayer, the business in which engaged, the amount of invested capital and net income shown by the return, and the amount of invested capital as determined under such subdivision. The commissioner shall furnish a copy of such record and other detailed information with respect to such cases when required by resolution of either House of Congress, without regard to the restrictions contained in section 257.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 142, after line 21, to insert:

PART VI.—REORGANIZATIONS.

SEC. 331. That in the case of the reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership of a trade or business, or change of ownership of property, after March 3, 1917, if an interest or control in such trade or business or property of 50 per cent or more remains in the same persons, or any of them, then no asset transferred or received from the previous owner shall for the purpose of determining invested capital be allowed a greater value than would have been allowed under this title in computing the invested capital of such previous owner if such asset had not been so transferred or received: Provided, That if such previous owner was not a corporation, then the value of any asset so transferred or received shall be taken at its cost of acquisition (at the date when acquired by such previous owner) with proper allowance for depreciation, impairment, betterment, or development, but no addition to the original cost shall be made for any charge or expenditure deducted as expense or otherwise on or after March 1, 1913, in computing the net income of such previous owner for purposes of taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 143, after line 20, to insert the following heading: "Part VII.—Miscellaneous."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 143, line 22, before the words "a corporation," to strike out "(b) If" and to insert "Sec. 335. (a) That if"; on page 144, line 3, after the words "revenue act of," to strike out the numerals "1918" and to insert "1918"; at the beginning of line 4, before the words "which the," to strike out "(as in force prior to the passage of this act)"; in line 7, after the word "under," to strike out "the revenue act of 1918 (as in force on December 31, 1921) which" and to insert "this title, which"; in line 12, after the numerals "1918," to strike out "(as in force prior to the passage of this act)"; and in line 17, after the word "of," to strike out "the revenue act of 1918" and to insert "this act," so as to make the paragraph read:

PART VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

SEC. 335. (a) That if a corporation (other than a personal-service corporation) makes return for a fiscal year beginning in 1920 and ending in 1921, the war-profits and excess-profits tax for the taxable year 1921 shall be the sum of: (1) The same proportion of a tax for the entire period computed under the revenue act of 1918, which the portion of such period falling within the calendar year 1920 is of the entire period, and (2) the same proportion of a tax for the entire period computed under this title, which the portion of such period falling within the calendar year 1921 is of the entire period. Any amount heretofore or hereafter paid on account of the tax imposed for such taxable year by the revenue act of 1918 shall be credited toward the payment of the tax as above computed, and if the amount so paid exceeds the amount of such tax, the excess shall be credited or refunded to the corporation in accordance with the provisions of section 252 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 144, at the beginning of line 18, to strike out "(c)" and to insert "(b)"; and in line 23, after the word "under," to strike out "the revenue act of 1918 (as in force on December 31, 1921) which" and to insert "this title, which," so as make the paragraph read:

(b) If a corporation (other than a personal-service corporation) makes a return for a fiscal year beginning in 1921 and ending in 1922, the war-profits and excess-profits tax for the portion of the year falling within the calendar year 1921 shall be an amount equivalent to the same proportion of a tax for the entire period computed under this title, which the portion of such period falling within the calendar year 1921 is of the entire period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 145, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 336. That every corporation not exempt under section 304 shall make a return for the purposes of this title. Such returns shall be made, and the taxes imposed by this title shall be paid, at the same times and places, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions as is provided in the case of returns and payment of income tax by corporations for the purposes of Title II, and all the provisions of that title not inapplicable, including penalties, are hereby made applicable to the taxes imposed by this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 145, after line 13, to insert:

SEC. 337. That in the case of a bona fide sale of mines, oil or gas wells, or any interest therein, where the principal value of the property has been demonstrated by prospecting or exploration and discovery work done by the taxpayer, the portion of the tax imposed by this title attributable to such sale shall not exceed 20 per cent of the selling price of such property or interest.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 145, after line 21, to insert:

EFFECTIVE DATE OF TITLE.

SEC. 338. That this title shall take effect as of January 1, 1921.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there is considerable interest in the Senate as to the character of the course of the proceedings this afternoon and this evening, and I think perhaps this would be a good opportunity to submit to the Senate a unanimous-consent agreement, which I will ask the Senate to ratify, outlining the course of procedure. I have handed it to the Secretary, and will ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Senate will continue in session until not later than 7 o'clock p. m. to-day for the consideration of uncontested amendments to the pending bill, and that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, October 27, 1921, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon amendments to section 230, and that all amendments to said section 230 except the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] shall be disposed of on said calendar day; and, further, that at not later than 7 o'clock p. m. to-day the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, to that agreement I assent, provided it is acceptable to the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned it is satisfactory in its present form; but I should like to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he include the 5-minute provision which we have generally been adopting for debate of amendments which may be offered later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to make the same suggestion.

Mr. PENROSE. I am willing to have the Secretary include the provision found in the present unanimous-consent agreement permitting five minutes to the proponent of an amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Provided, That any Senator proposing an amendment after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. may explain the same for a period not exceeding five minutes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the unanimous-consent agreement is satisfactory to me.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. Committee amendments, of course, are first in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. LODGE. There will be some individual amendments offered subsequently. I take it that this does not cut out the opportunity to offer individual amendments after the committee amendments have all been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not seem to do so.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest that as the Senate has consented to the proposition that the mover of an amendment after 4 o'clock may devote five minutes to its explanation, it seems to me that the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee who may be designated ought to have five minutes to explain it. A little while ago the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] presented an amendment which I do not think half a dozen Members of the Senate understood—I did not understand it—and yet it was voted into the bill.

I do not want to afford any opportunity for debate, but I think we ought to know what an amendment is, if a new one is to be presented for the consideration of the Senate. The Senator presenting it might state it in such form as to be somewhat confusing to the Senate unless the opposite side was heard; and I think there is no better provision than to allow the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee to make reply if he sees fit, limited to five minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. On page 79——

Mr. PENROSE. Will not the Senator wait until this unanimous-consent agreement is perfected?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is about the unanimous-consent agreement. I have offered an amendment, which has been printed, to subsection (b) of section 230, on page 79. Would that amendment be in order, under the unanimous-consent agreement, to be voted on to-morrow? It strikes out the "15," and inserts "10" and other matter in lieu thereof. I am inclined myself to think that it is in order, but I should like to know about it before agreeing to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the committee amendment, and would be in order.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not intend to ask to have the unanimous-consent agreement further amended. I shall, of course, trust to the honor and sense of propriety of Senators. It does not seem to me fitting that an amendment should be offered in an evasive spirit, and not in good faith, for the purpose of speaking five minutes. I do not want to criticize the introduction of an amendment with such a purpose on this afternoon; but I sincerely hope that that practice, which is clearly an abuse and an indirect violation of the spirit of the agreement, will not be persisted in, and I take it that it is so understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

The agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate will continue in session until not later than 7 o'clock p. m. to-day for the consideration of uncontested amendments to the pending bill; that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Thursday, October 27, 1921, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon amendments to section 230, and that all amendments to said section 230 (except the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH), shall be disposed of on said calendar day: Provided, That any Senator proposing an amendment after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. may explain the same for a period not exceeding five minutes, and that a member of the Committee on Finance may have a like period of time in which to make reply; and

It is further agreed that at not later than 7 o'clock p. m. to-day the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow, reserving the right, however, to proceed to the consideration of executive business prior to the taking of such recess.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, according to my understanding of the arrangement, we go back to page 78 and begin to read the amendments passed over. The Clerk, I hope, will go on.

The READING CLERK. Turning to page 78, after line 20, it is proposed to insert:

PART III.—CORPORATIONS.

TAX ON CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 230. That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1918, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax at the following rates:

(a) For the calendar year 1921, 10 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236; and

(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 15 per cent of such excess amount.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, that is an objected amendment, and, of course, will go over.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, it goes over. Does the Senator refer to the whole paragraph, or merely to section (b)?

Mr. SIMMONS. The whole paragraph relating to that subject.

The READING CLERK. The matter from line 21, on page 78, to line 14, on page 79, is passed over.

Continuing the reading on page 79, in lines 24 and 25, the committee proposes to strike out the words "operated exclusively for the purpose of" and to insert the words "substantially all the business of which is to confined to," so as to read:

(4) Domestic building and loan associations substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members, etc.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as this amendment was originally proposed by the committee it was satisfactory to my colleague and myself. Later on, I understand, some additional amendment was proposed by the experts that will undo what it was intended to accomplish by the original committee amendment, and it differentiates between the two classes of building and loan associations in the State of Ohio.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of allowing me to offer an amendment? Then he can address himself to it, and then we can explain the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection, of course, to the offering of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that it is a committee amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand. I do not object to the committee amendment as it was originally presented and as it is printed in the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read the amendment to the Senator, and I do not think he will object to this. After the word "members," on line 1, page 20, insert the following:

On the basis of their stock holdings.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that absolutely destroys what it was proposed to accomplish by the Senate amendment. I tried to make clear, when this matter was up some days ago, that there are substantially two classes of building and loan associations in Ohio. Under the Ohio law loans can be made either to stockholders or to others. Some of these building and loan associations loan entirely on stock. That is to say, when an application is made for a loan, at the same time the applicant subscribes for a given number of shares of stock, and when the stock is paid up it cancels the mortgage.

Others provide for the application for membership. A small fee is paid. With still others the loans are made to borrowers who are not members of the corporation, but all those corporations are doing business under the general building and loan association law of the State. They are doing the same business practically, and if you are going to exempt only those who make loans to stockholders you are going to subject one class of these building and loan associations to the tax and not subject the others to the tax. Their earnings, except that portion which is passed to surplus under the statute, as a rule, are distributed every six months or every year, so that if you are going to subject to the payment of a tax those companies only a small proportion of whose funds are invested in loans other than to stockholders you are practically going to bankrupt that class of corporations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator that under the unanimous-consent agreement this is clearly an amendment to which objection will be made, and it should go over. The idea of the unanimous-consent agreement is to see how many of these amendments are unobjected to and to act upon them, and if there is objection made to an amendment pass it over. Clearly this is an amendment to which objection will be made.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator is justified in making the suggestion he has made, and if it is the desire to act only on those amendments to which there is no objection——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the agreement.

Mr. POMERENE. I will content myself now by asking that this matter go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will go over.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to say what perhaps I ought to have said when the unanimous-consent agreement was made, that I understand I have a right to ask at 7 o'clock for a short executive session. There are a number of reports to be made, and when that hour is reached, under the agreement I shall ask the Senate to take a short executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 82, to insert lines 13 and 14, as follows:

(14) Personal service corporations. This subdivision shall not be in effect after December 31, 1921.

It was passed over on the request of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. I withdraw my objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 84, line 14, to strike out the word "taxpayer" and the semicolon, and to insert "taxpayer" and a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That in the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922, there shall be allowed as a deduction interest paid or accrued during such taxable year and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, even though the interest therefrom is so wholly exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have submitted a draft of an amendment to be offered in lieu of this provision to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and also to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], which carries out the action of the Senate taken in regard to the same matter as applied to individuals, found on page 38 of the bill. It is worded better than the amendment first agreed upon. I move, on page 84, to strike out lines 15 to 21, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the language which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Strike out lines 15 to 21, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof:

That in the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922, there shall be allowed as a deduction in addition to the above so much of the interest paid or accrued during such taxable year and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, the interest upon which is so wholly exempt, as is in excess of the interest received or accrued therefrom during the same period.

Mr. SMOOT. That has exactly the same effect, but it is worded a little better.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it carries out the spirit of the amendment heretofore adopted.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that covers the object I had in mind in my amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that we now turn back to page 38 and strike out lines 14 to 19, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the exact words of the amendment which has just been adopted. We will have to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the amendment on page 38, lines 13 to 19, inclusive, was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed, on page 38, to strike out lines 13 to 19, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof:

In the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922, there shall be allowed as a deduction, in addition to the above, so much of the interest paid or accrued during such taxable year and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, the interest upon which is so wholly exempt, as is in excess of the interest received or accrued therefrom during the same period.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understand that. Will not the Senator give an explanation of it?

Mr. SMOOT. In the case of a person making a loan to carry tax-exempt bonds, the existing law allows not only the interest upon the bonds as an exemption but the interest that may be paid for the loan. This amendment modifies it by providing that for the year 1922 he can only deduct the difference between the interest on the bonds and the interest which he pays.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the same as the amendment we have just adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is also an amendment which was passed over, on page 38, line 13, which the Secretary will state.

The READING CLERK. On page 38, line 13, strike out the word "taxpayer" and the semicolon, and insert the word "taxpayer" and a colon and the words "Provided, That."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to submit an amendment which I propose, and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received and printed and lie on the table.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania, as to the provision on page 84 providing exemptions of interest paid on funded indebtedness, whether I may recur to it later on, after the committee amendments have been disposed of, to offer an amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly; I will be very glad to have the Senator recur to it.

Mr. KING. I have an amendment to offer with respect to dividends, but I shall not offer it until after the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. Ample opportunity will be given the Senator, as far as I am concerned.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 86, to strike out lines 18 and 19, in the following words:

(6) The amount of dividends included under gross income.

And to insert:

(6) The amount received as dividends (A) from a domestic corporation other than a foreign trade corporation, or (B) from any foreign corporation when it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that more than 50 per cent of the gross income of such foreign corporation for the 3-year period ending with the close of its taxable year preceding the declaration of such dividends (or for such part of such period as the foreign corporation has been in existence) was derived from sources within the United States as determined under section 217.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that, on line 21, page 86, the words "other than a foreign trade corporation" be stricken out.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to submit a proposed amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire of my colleague whether any further amendment is required to subdivision (6), to which an amendment has just been agreed to, in view of the action of the Senate with respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin? I refer to the words "(B) from any foreign corporation when it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner," and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. No; this is a foreign trade corporation, and that is different. So there is no necessity for any amendment. The amendment I offered was to make it conform to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, which was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Then subdivision (B), to which I have just called attention, is the existing law?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not the existing law. Under existing law, the Senator will remember, if a foreign corporation owns any kind of securities here they can claim an exemption of dividends. We cut that out, and provide that "when it is shown to the satisfaction of the commissioner that more than 50 per cent" of their business "was derived from sources within the United States," and so forth. So if a foreign corporation comes here now they can not claim exemption of dividends if they own one share of stock in a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 87, after line 4, to insert the following:

(7) A reasonable allowance for the exhaustion, wear and tear of property used in the trade or business, including a reasonable allowance for obsolescence. In the case of such property acquired before March 1, 1913, this deduction shall be computed upon the basis of its fair market price or value as of March 1, 1913.

Mr. KING. During the discussion of this section some days ago the matter was referred to Dr. Adams, as I recall, and at my request he has submitted an amendment which relates to it. I have not had an opportunity to study it and to see its effect, and I ask that the amendment may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over was, on page 87, beginning with line 17, subdivision (8).

The VICE PRESIDENT. This has already been read. Does the Senate desire to have it read again?

Mr. SMOOT. It has been read. I want to offer an amendment to it. On page 87, line 25, after the word "allowed," I move to insert a comma and the following words:

For any taxable year ending before March 3, 1924 (if claim therefor was made at the time of filing return for the taxable year 1918 or 1919).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 90, after line 3, to insert:

(10) In the case of insurance companies (other than life insurance companies), in addition to the above (unless otherwise allowed): (A) The net addition required by law to be made within the taxable year to reserve funds (including in the case of assessment insurance companies the actual deposit of sums with State or Territorial officers pursuant to law as additions to guaranty or reserve funds); and (B) the sums other than dividends paid within the taxable year on policy and annuity contracts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 94, line 18, to strike out "In the case of a domestic corporation, $2,000," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In the case of a domestic corporation the net income of which is $25,000 or less, a specific credit of $2,000."

It was passed over at the request of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. I have offered an amendment to that provision, but the majority members of the committee have presented an amendment to which I think I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator has seen the amendment and has agreed to it. The amendment is the one which has just been stated at the desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate that the purpose of the amendment, which is a modification of the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, is to take care of small corporations regardless of their earnings. I can readily conceive of small corporations—that is, corporations having a small capital stock—having very large earnings, larger proportionately than many large corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the case.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from North Carolina whether the amendment offered by the committee is an improvement upon his or whether it does not permit a discrimination in view of the notorious large earnings of many small corporations. I ask for information rather than by way of criticism.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state very frankly that I prefer the amendment which I offered, but as I did not think that I could successfully press that amendment, I was satisfied to take this proposed compromise. I would prefer that the corporations should be allowed no exemption at all; I do not see any principle upon which they should be entitled to it; but if any are allowed an exemption, I think it should be the corporation of small earnings. I am disposed to accept the amendment which was offered by the majority members of the committee. It repeals the exemption as to all corporations earning in excess of $25,000.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, every corporation in the United States that does not earn a net income of $25,000 has no exemption whatever.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me, is he able to state what amount of revenue we can realize by limiting this exemption to those corporations which have earned net $25,000 or less?

Mr. SMOOT. Thirty million dollars—or perhaps I had better state it this way: On those corporations which are not exempted under this provision we would gain $30,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Those that are not exempt?

Mr. SMOOT. The corporations earning a net income of more than $25,000 under this amendment are not given any exemption whatever, and through the lack of that exemption the corporations will pay into the Treasury of the United States $30,000,000 more than they would under existing law.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that the committee have decided to put this through in this way and it is probably going to go through, but I think I perhaps differ from the members on both sides of that committee in that where a corporation is doing business, if once we recognize the wisdom of making an exemption in favor of the individual taxpayer, if we shall keep in mind the uncertainties of business, I am at a loss to understand why a very modest exemption might not be made in favor of the corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. POMERENE. In just a moment. The uncertainties of business do not all attach to individuals. They are just as liable to happen to the corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Much more so, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I am willing for the sake of my argument to say that they are on the same plane. We all know there is shrinkage in values, and so forth. I have not thought that the exemption heretofore made of $2,000 was excessive. That is the way I feel about it, and I am glad that the committee has reserved the exemption to the smaller corporations, but I would extend it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the correct principle about this, as I said, would be to abolish altogether the exemption of our corporations. There is to my mind a very clear distinction between an exemption allowed individuals under our income-tax law and this exemption as to the corporations. It grows out of the fact that a corporation, if permitted to deduct from its income for the purpose of ascertaining the taxable part of that income, takes into account every possible expense incurred in the production of that income. On the other hand, an individual with a small income, to whom is given the exemption, is not permitted to do that, and the exemption given him is in lieu of that.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator, of course, refers to family expenses, I agree with him.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. But when it comes to business, and individual A is manufacturing a given product or is engaged in mercantile business, and corporation B is engaged in identically the same business, each one can charge against that business all of the expenses that are incident to the business, whether it is the individual or the corporation. That is my position.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the individual can not charge any of his family expenses against his income.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true, and they can not charge any family expenses of the corporation, because there are none.

Mr. SIMMONS. The corporation has no family expenses. Every expense that the corporation has or can have is permitted to be deducted before any part of the earnings are subject to taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. Just for the record I wish to state that the only reason why the exemption was given in the first place, and the theory of it is applicable not only in our country but all other countries, is to take care of the returns so that when the income gets down so low on a corporation that it does not pay the Government of the United States to send a man to investigate whether the return is right or not, the Government is saved that expense. That is the reason why the exemption was made originally. I quite agree with the Senator from Ohio that if we are going beyond that all ought to be treated alike.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 95, after line 21, to insert a subhead and a new section, as follows:

PAYMENT OF CORPORATION INCOME TAX AT SOURCE.

SEC. 237. That in the case of foreign corporations subject to taxation under this title not engaged in trade or business within the United States and not having any office or place of business therein, there shall be deducted and withheld at the source in the same manner and upon the same items of income as is provided in section 221 a tax equal to 15 per cent thereof (but during the calendar year 1921 only 10 per cent), and such tax shall be returned and paid in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as provided in that section: Provided, That in the case of interest described in subdivision (b) of that section the deduction and withholding shall be at the rate of 2 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I will have to ask that that go over to-day, because it is dependent upon whether the 15 per cent tax is agreed to by a later vote. This has connection with the proposition of the 15 per cent normal tax, and therefore I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will report the next amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 103, in line 2, to strike out "sections 230 and 1000" and insert in lieu thereof "section 230 of this act and by Title III of the revenue act of 1918."

Mr. SMOOT. That will have to go over, because it is dependent upon what we are to decide with reference to the capital-stock tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is, on page 103, line 7, to insert the word "life" after the word "domestic," so as to make the sentence read:

In the case of a domestic life insurance, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah wish this to go over?

Mr. SMOOT. There is an amendment that the committee desires to offer on page 103, line 8, in lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out the words "12½ per cent of its net income" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

the same percentage of its net income as is imposed upon other corporations by section 230.

We can agree to that amendment, because no matter what change is made it will conform to whatever action is taken.

Mr. KING. May I inquire what is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. It is to impose a normal tax upon life insurance companies, just as we do upon other insurance companies.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that the Senator let that go over with the other, although I think he is right.

Mr. SMOOT. It will not make any difference whether it is 10 or 12½ or 15 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it will. I shall not object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment on page 103, in line 7, to insert the word "life" after the word "domestic" and before the words "insurance companies," has not yet been agreed to. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment just offered by the Senator from Utah will now be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 103, line 8, in lieu of the committee amendment proposed, strike out the words "12½ per cent of its net income" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

the same percentage of its net income as is imposed upon other corporations by section 230.

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 103, line 9, before the word "insurance," to insert the word "life."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment, offered by the Senator from Utah, is on page 103, line 10, in lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out "12½ per cent of its net income from sources within the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

the same percentage of its net income from sources within the United States as is imposed upon the net income of other corporations by section 230.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the same as the amendment just agreed to and for the same purpose, only it applies to foreign corporations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask whether the amendment on page 103, line 4, striking out the date "1922" and inserting the date "1921," has been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment, passed over at the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], is on page 116, beginning in line 4 and going down to the word "taxes," in line 2, on page 118.

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment has been read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may it be understood that if the amendment shall be agreed to, when the Senator from Missouri returns to the Chamber, if he desires, he may move to reopen the question, and that there will be no objection to his doing so?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There never is any objection to such a motion or request.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. KING. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next passed-over amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment, passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], is on page 125, line 1, beginning with the heading "Returns to be public records," down to and including line 20, on page 126.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to offer any amendment or opposition to that provision, though I think he does. I therefore ask that the amendment go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment, passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], is on page 128, beginning in line 16, with the heading "Retroactive exemption of income from sources within the possessions of the United States," down to and including line 20, on page 129.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that that also go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is the first amendment on page 146, to strike out line 1, as follows:

Title IV.—Estate tax amendments.

And to insert:

Title IV.—Estate tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course we can not take up the question of the estate tax to-night. There will doubtless be some discussion about the estate-tax provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from North Carolina desires that it shall go over under the unanimous-consent agreement, of course it will go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, I am not going to agree to the amendment of the committee in regard to the estate tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment, passed over at the request of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], is, on page 176, under the heading, "Title VI.—Tax on soft drinks and constituent parts thereof," to strike out from line 4 to line 25, inclusive.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are some changes, though not many, to be made in that amendment, and I ask that it go over.

Mr. KING. I have an amendment to offer on page 177. The amendment has been printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that all of the amendments on page 177 have been agreed to and his amendment would not be in order at this time because we are now considering only committee amendments.

Mr. KING. What I was about to ask was that the committee examine the amendment which I have proposed to offer. I hope they will see their way to accede to it without any debate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator in charge of the bill concerning the committee amendment on page 176?

Mr. SMOOT. That has gone over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I gather, that amendment operates to repeal the tax of $2.20 per proof gallon on distilled spirits and the next paragraph is partially a definition. Is there any other committee amendment which is intended to take the place of the language proposed to be stricken out?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator to amendment numbered 42, which has been reported by the Committee on Finance to take the place of the language here proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that amendment numbered 42, to which the Senator from Utah refers, is really going to be proposed by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the reason I ask that the amendment just stated shall go over at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the committee will not take the responsibility of the amendment to which the Senator from Utah refers.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment, passed over at the request of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], is, on page 197, line 15, after the word "presses," to insert a comma and the words "skates, snowshoes, skis, toboggans."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think that amendment will have to go over again.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask, does the request extend to all the excise taxes?

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish it to extend to chewing gum, to cameras, photographic films, candy, furs, and so on.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, evidently we can not agree to the excise-tax provisions to-night.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest, in view of certain other amendments that are going to be presented, that we pass over all the excise-tax items. I may wish to make a few suggestions myself with regard to some of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. As it meets with the views of the Senator from Ohio, I suggest that it all go over.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it should all go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands, then, that the excise-tax provisions, extending down to line 12, on page 212, are to be passed over. That order will be made.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just for information, may I ask when the Senator from Utah expects to present his sales-tax amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. At the very first opportunity which presents itself. I will say to the Senator that I can not offer the amendment until the bill is perfected by having the committee amendments disposed of. When that is done, I am going to offer my amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. But the disposition of the excise-tax provisions may depend largely upon what may be done with the proposal to levy a sales tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I am hoping that the sales tax will be adopted and that we will then be able to eliminate all the excise taxes which the Senator from Ohio has in mind.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 233, lines 7 to 12, where it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 1102. That whoever—
(a) Makes, signs, issues, or accepts, or causes to be made, signed, issued, or accepted any instrument, document, or paper of any kind or description whatsoever without the full amount of tax thereon being duly paid;

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask who requested that paragraph be passed over?

Mr. SMOOT. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked that it go over. He said he desired to look at it more carefully than he had time to when the amendment was reached on the first reading of the bill. He was in the Chamber just a moment ago, but has gone out temporarily. I doubt very much, however, whether he desires to say anything more about the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. We might go on with other amendments which have been passed over and come back to that when the junior Senator from Utah is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I have an amendment to offer on behalf of the committee, Mr. President. On page 233, I move to strike out lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, and in line 17, to strike out the letter "(C)" and insert the letter "(B)"; and, in line 22, to strike out the letter "(D)" and insert the letter "(C)."

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what the reason for that amendment is?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate already has stricken out the tax upon parcel-post matter, and, in order to make the bill conform with that amendment, we have got to strike out the lines from 13 to 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the Senate has already adopted that amendment, and it will be necessary, therefore, to reconsider the vote whereby it was adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I now move the adoption of the amendment just stated by me. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 233 it is proposed to strike out lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, to strike out the letter "(C)" in line 17 and insert the letter "(B)," and in line 22 to strike out the letter "(D)" and insert the letter "(C)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has returned to the Chamber, and says that he has no objection to the amendment which was reached a few moments ago and which had been passed over at his request.

Mr. SMOOT. The junior Senator from Utah is in the Chamber, and I understand that he has withdrawn his objection to subdivision (A) on page 233, embraced between lines 8 and 12.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my objection to that, as I now recall, related to the fact that it seemed to impose a liability without any criminal intent. I am advised that in the enforcement of the law there never has been any difficulty and no injustices have been done. I am not quite satisfied with the phraseology; I think it is rather dangerous legislation; but in view of the interpretation placed upon it by the department and the manner in which it has been administered, which I am informed has resulted in uniform justice, I shall not delay the Senate by opposing the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, subdivision (A), on page 233, is agreed to; and, without objection, the section as amended is agreed to.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 239.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment on page 239 depends upon an amendment which will be offered as to fire insurance. That paragraph has been rewritten, and the committee will offer the amendment at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paragraph will be passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the amendments passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then apparently the question I was about to ask is unnecessary. I had especial reference to the amendment on page 247, paragraph 15, at the bottom of the page, relating to the tax on the premiums of marine insurance policies written with foreign companies.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Are we operating at present under an agreement not to take up contested matters?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that was the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will I have a chance later on to move to reconsider the vote by which paragraph 15 was adopted in order to get some information about it?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. If there are no other uncontested amendments to be disposed of now, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, October 27, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, October 26, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Heavenly Father, feeling our own poverty and littleness, we wonder how Thou canst love us so much and care for us so tenderly. Surely Thou hast planned a great destiny for us. In the ages to come we shall know of the meaning of Thy amazing mercy and our redemption. In the meantime enable us to go from strength to strength with an abundance of faith in our God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REDUCTION AND READJUSTMENT OF FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a reduction and readjustment of freight rates made since the general readjustment of August 26, 1920. This is for the purpose of having an authoritative statement on the subject. It comes from the Interstate Commerce Commission. I also want to print a letter from Commissioner Lewis in connection with it. I submitted this to Mr. Smith and he says it will make about 16 pages in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Would it not be advisable in a matter of such importance as this to have it printed as a House document. Would not the gentleman prefer to have it printed as a House document?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would be glad to do that, and, Mr. Speaker, I modify my request in accordance with the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the matter referred to be printed as a House document. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes on the matter of procedure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, for years there has been a sentiment in the House that in the interest of good legislation, and for the convenience of Members, we ought to know a little further in advance than we have generally been informed in the past as to legislation that was likely to be taken up for consideration. Members on both sides have called attention to the need and advisability of arranging, if possible, and so far as it is possible under the rules of the House a program at least a few days in advance in order that Members may study the bills that are likely to be brought and that they may give particular attention to matters that they are informed about and interested in. We have made a very earnest effort in the last year to outline programs so far as it was possible to do so. The programs thus tentatively agreed upon have been announced from time to time from the floor.

We have now taken another step in the matter to accommodate the Members of the House, and, we believe, in the public interest. Yesterday there was placed on the bulletin board in the lobby a tentative program for the week. Members realize that such a program must be purely tentative. Certain matters come up under the general rules of the House, but the House must determine what will be done at any given time. So these programs indicate only a tentative agreement of program subject to change at any time the House may determine and as conditions may warrant.

I am not sure that we will find we can follow these programs closely enough to make it worth while to continue them, but I am very much in hopes that through consultation with the Speaker, members of the steering committee, chairmen and members of the various legislative committees, and chairmen and members of the Rules Committee we may be able to present a fairly accurate picture a week in advance of what the House is likely to consider. We have undertaken this new departure in the hope that it will be useful to the Members, particularly in the hope that it will not only enable but will incline Members to give careful attention in advance to the legislation that is likely to be considered. I should be very glad indeed to have suggestions from Members at any time in regard to these tentative programs and as to whether or no it is wise to continue them.

CONSOLIDATION OF GOVERNMENT SCIENTIFIC BUREAUS.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Dr. Arthur McDonald, of Washington, setting forth a plan that he has worked out for the reorganization of Government scientific departments. I believe it will be of interest to Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey How long is it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. It is about five printed pages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the Committee on Public Lands.

NATIONAL FORESTS OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 920, for the consolidation of forest lands in or near national forests, New Mexico, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up the bill S. 920. This bill is on the Union Calendar and the House will automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within or near the exterior boundaries of any national forest situated within the State of New Mexico, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the public interests will be benefited thereby and the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may cause to be patented to the party conveying to the United States not to exceed an equal value of such national forest land timber within the national forests of the State of New Mexico, the values in each instance to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and acceptable to the owner as fair compensation, consideration being given to any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, minerals, or easements. Any timber given under such exchange shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become a part of the national forest: Provided, That before any such exchange is effected notice of the exchange, reciting the lands involved, shall be published once each week for four consecutive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county nearest to the lands affected by such exchange.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "or," strike out the word "near" and insert in lieu thereof the words "within 6 miles of."

Page 2, line 1, after the word "land," insert "or other Government land, nonmineral, nonirrigable, not suited to the raising of agricultural crops except grass, in said State, or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of."

Page 2, line 8, after the word "compensation," strike out "consideration being given to any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, minerals, or easements."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that I am recognized for an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MONTOYA].

Mr. MONTOYA. Mr. Chairman, we have now under consideration Senate bill 920, which has passed the Senate, and which is for the purpose of consolidating the forest lands in or near the national forests in New Mexico, and for other purposes. This bill is in the interest of the settlers of New Mexico in that to-day through the creation of these national forests a great many of these settlers have homesteads and lands therein, and a great many of them would now like to be out of the restrictions fixed by the rules and regulations of the Government to apply to the national forests, and to take in lieu of the lands within the national forests adjacent lands. This would be beneficial to both the settlers and to the Government, because it will help the consolidation of the forests. We have in New Mexico six national forest reserves, the Carson in the north, the Santa Fe in the southwestern part, the Manzano in the central part, the Lincoln in the southeastern part, the Datil in the southwest, and the Gila in the southern part.

A great many of the settlers in these forest reserves would like to get out into the adjacent lands, as I say, so as to be free from the restrictions placed by the Government in the management of the reservations. Mention was made here the other day of the fact that crooks in the West were trying to get the benefits of the lands from the Government and to give back other lands that are worthless. I deny that imputation. Crooks are not found in the West; they are found elsewhere. So far as anything crooked in this proposition is concerned, nothing of that kind can result, because the exchanges of the lands are to be under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior, to be satisfactory to these officials, and if they allow anything crooked to come in, then we can have no confidence in our high officials who manage our Government.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTOYA. Yes.

Mr. BOX. I note that by a committee amendment the bill is so amended as to authorize the Secretary to accept lands within 6 miles of the forest reserves. Does that involve an enlargement of the reserves or the holding of land at that distance outside of them?

Mr. MONTOYA. I do not believe it does. It simply puts a limitation on the distance from the forest reserves.

Mr. BOX. What is the idea in accepting lands 6 miles from these reserves?

Mr. MONTOYA. That is to give a chance to the settlers to select the lands which probably will be most acceptable, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture, so as to give some leeway in the matter.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTOYA. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I would state that in a number of these forests there are large gaps, cul-de-sacs, of privately owned land, jutting into the national forests, and it is the purpose of the Forest Service to consolidate the forests and get these cul-de-sacs or indentations within the exterior boundaries of the forests.

Mr. MONTOYA. I would say further that this bill has been reported on favorably by the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture. The bill has been under consideration by the Committee on the Public Lands, and amendments which were thought proper to the bill were made, which are now before you for consideration. I ask the generous consideration of the bill on the part of the House in favor of the needs of the State of New Mexico and the settlers thereof. There is nothing that can be construed into any particular advantage that the settlers may acquire. They simply want to get out of a situation which has become intolerable in certain cases, because of being within the forest reserves, and of having to comply with the restrictions set up by rules and regulations of the Government, in the holding of their homesteads and lands that they have acquired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTOYA. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The first committee amendment, on page 1, line 5, authorizes the addition to the national forests of lands within 6 miles of the present boundaries of those forests. That gives quite a good latitude.

Mr. MONTOYA. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I call the gentleman's attention to the second amendment and ask him if he will not consent to eliminate it from the bill. I know if I call the gentleman's attention to it he will eliminate it from the bill, so that there will be no possible question of the uniformity of this legislation. On page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, the committee suggests an amendment to strike out the words "or other Government lands, nonmineral, nonirrigable, and not suited to the raising of agricultural crops, except grass, in said State," and so forth. That authorizes the exchange of lands in the national forests and within the boundaries as extended by the provisions of this bill to 6 miles beyond its present boundary for any land in the State of New Mexico not within the boundaries of the reserves. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to eliminate that from the bill and from this kind of legislation. I am in favor of the general bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is a committee amendment to which we gave a great deal of attention.

Mr. MONTOYA. I submit it to the consideration of the House.

Mr. SINNOTT. We desire to retain it.

Mr. RAKER. I am in hearty accord with this, and my people are in favor of the legislation; but this is one feature that we have not included in any legislation, and I wondered how the gentleman felt about eliminating it.

Mr. MONTOYA. I must submit to the action of the Committee on Public Lands. The gentleman is a member of that committee, and he was present I suppose when that amendment was adopted.

Mr. RAKER. I was not. Unfortunately for me, I was not present.

Mr. MONTOYA. I submit to the action of the committee. They considered that portion of the bill, and they submitted an amendment which they thought necessary, and I have to submit to the action of my committee by which I am bound.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is not insistent upon that particularly, is he?

Mr. MONTOYA. I do insist upon the committee amendment; yes, sir. I have to insist upon it; I think it is a good proposition.

Mr. RAKER. In the gentleman's time, this is one of the times, I believe——

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman will have time if he desires. I do not think he ought to use the time of the gentleman from New Mexico. The gentleman will have time if he desires.

Mr. RAKER. My point is that I do not want to take the time of the committee if the gentleman will consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does the gentleman desire another five minutes? I will yield five minutes additional to the gentleman, so that the gentleman from Wisconsin may interrogate him if he so desires.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any information as to the total number of acres included within these respective six national forest reserves in New Mexico and the total number of acres that are in private ownership and the number of acres that are in Government ownership?

Mr. MONTOYA. I have not that; no, sir.

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will yield, I can supply that information. Does the gentleman desire to know the total area of the forest reserves in New Mexico? Eight million three hundred and eight thousand four hundred and thirty-four acres, and the privately owned land within the forest amounts to 1,178,612 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman from his acquaintance with any one or more of these national forest reserves give the committee any information as to the proportion of the lands that are in private ownership that have been cut over that would be available for exchange under the terms of this act?

Mr. MONTOYA. I am not informed as to that, and I could not give the gentleman or the House any information; no, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. I recall some years ago we granted some rights to a railroad company, I believe, in New Mexico to continue lumber operations down there, and the argument was that it would be in conjunction with some national forest reserves lumber operations, and I thought perhaps the gentleman could give information as to how much privately owned land in these forest reserves had been cut over and how much was still in the original natural state.

Mr. MONTOYA. No, sir; I have no such information to give the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does the gentleman from California desire time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico yields back two minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I will take the other side; I only want about 10 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman may proceed now.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this legislation has been very carefully gone into by the committee with hearings, and the general provisions of the bill relative to exchange of lands within national forests to private individuals for Government lands in national forests as well as timber have been very carefully guarded. This bill adds and allows an extension of the exterior boundaries of the national forests by reason of the indentations and irregular lines; and the measure, so far as it relates to privately owned lands that are really cut over and that the Government in substance has to protect, is to my mind perfectly satisfactory and wise. To the question of the amendment to strike out the provision allowing the owner to retain a reservation, the committee has given that a great deal of thought and has come to the conclusion on all of these bills to eliminate that from the bill, to the end that the party who transferred any privately owned land could not retain a prospective mineral right in the land whether it was oil, gas, coal, gold, or silver. We think it is right. The Government is fully protected. There are a number of bills of a similar nature, and therefore what I have to say now will apply to those and save the time of the committee later. The exchange is value for value, and therefore the Government is protected, the individual is protected, and it is not compulsory with the private owner to make any exchange. I was hoping for a map to come in here, and the map will show in a minute what would take me a much longer time to state. The Government will be protected in the way of expense and can afford to take this land for reforestation where the private individual could not. I think in this instance, as in practically all of these exchanges or most of the land—that is, all the land desired to be exchanged—has been cut over and it is cut-over land and hence it is within the boundaries, but it is desired to consolidate it. Now, here is a sample map of one of the national forests. This red line is now privately owned lands, outside the exterior boundaries of the national forests. Below where I run my pencil around it like that is the national forest. Now, above that is national forest which you see coming down here wedge shape; this is national forest coming clear down this side back from here down to here like that, so you see this land in here is all national forest. This strip is national forest, this is national forest, and this is national forest [illustrating].

This in red [indicating] is privately owned land that has been cut over. So the most valuable timber on this Government land is right adjacent to this private land. and has never been cut over. The purpose now is to transfer lands within these forests in California, similar to this and this [indicating], for this cut-over land which is producing timber. At one time the finest timber in the West grew on there, but it has been cut over. But, if provided for, it will maintain stream flow and will prevent fire. That is very inflammable by reason of the brush and down timber, and so forth, and most of the fires originate on lands adjacent to it, as in this place [indicating]. That is Government land there, that little strip, in the reserve. This land right along here on both sides is cut over, and so far as fire is concerned, it is 50 per cent more dangerous than that on the Government land. So if we can make the exchange we will reduce fire protection. We are putting ourselves in the shape of reforestation. We protect the stream flow and the Government is permitting other land to be used in other parts of the State, or possibly in this forest, and they are cut over on a system now in force by the Forest Service which piles and burns the brush, leaves the growing timber all over the land that is good, and you ride over a tract of land that has been cut over under the rules and regulations of the Forest Service and you see a young, well-developed and extended young forest growing up. But where it has been cut over in former days, or even now, by privately owning individuals, caring nothing for what the result may be, you find a devastated region. But if the Forest Service can take charge of it, we will have a reforestation; we will have a new forest over that land of many hundreds and thousands of acres, that in 30 or 40 years can be cut.

Mr. CANNON. The light color on the map represents magnificent forests?

Mr. RAKER. The greater part of it.

Mr. CANNON. Is this land to be exchanged acre for acre?

Mr. RAKER. No, sir. For instance, here are 160 acres of timberlands with the timber right on, that has not been cut. You estimate the value of that timber on that land per 1,000 feet. You estimate the value of this cut-over land, which may be $1.50 or $2 an acre. You say, "I will give you the timber on these 160 acres and you deed to me 2,000 acres of land." That is the proposition.

Mr. CANNON. Are you policing the forests that are so valuable that under the law the Government can care for them? Otherwise——

Mr. RAKER. To answer the distinguished gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. Otherwise you give the forest to the party that goes in and cuts it over?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And we will have a continued reforestation. It would be more easy to protect the forests now, and more just.

Mr. RAKER. It is difficult now, and with the exchange it will do so, for this reason: We police all this territory now. We have airplanes going over that country, and we have lookout stations to see where a fire starts. If it starts on this privately owned land, they must send a force there to put out the fire, because if it is extended it gets onto the Government land, and hundreds of thousands of feet of timber will be destroyed.

Mr. CANNON. I understand; at least, I think I understand. But these exchanges can be made anywhere in the national forest?

Mr. RAKER. In the State.

Mr. CANNON. In the State?

Mr. RAKER. In the State; yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. What amount of the national forests is there that is heavily timbered?

Mr. RAKER. In California I suppose there is—I will say, roughly—over a million acres—a million, anyway, in California.

Mr. CANNON. And what amount of the cut-over land is there?

Mr. RAKER. It runs into a couple of million acres.

Mr. CANNON. A million five hundred thousand acres of the good forests and a couple of million acres of the cut-over land?

Mr. RAKER. I think it is all of that, if not more.

Mr. CANNON. And it is 1 acre of the cut-over land for how many acres of the forest land?

Mr. RAKER. I think sometimes it would take from 160 to 1,000 acres to cover the value of 1 acre now of some of that publicly owned land upon which timber is now standing, the finest timber in the world.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. It has to be value for value.

I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts in a moment.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman knows that a few years ago there was an exchange of certain railroad lands for forest lands, and there was a great scandal about it. It was an exchange greatly to the detriment of the Government.

Mr. RAKER. In reply to the gentleman's statement, I will say that I think in my State there was more land taken by that exchange than in any other State. As I illustrated the other day, you have 160 acres of rabbit-brush land in some other place; you made your application for 160 acres of land in California that had virgin standing timber, and when you made your application the land officer had no way of refusing the exchange or saying anything about it. So he exchanged a worthless piece of 160 acres of land for a piece of land that in many instances was worth from $10,000 to $40,000 right up in my own district. Now, this legislation—all of it—provides that it must be value for value.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman considered this proposition: Would it not be better for the Government to buy the cut-over lands and reforest them, and then when the forests were used to have the land appraised and then given out in small quantities under conditions that would bind them to reforestation?

Mr. RAKER. No; and for this reason, derived from experience: I traveled last year over 5,000 miles, spending five weeks in the national forests in the West for the purpose of seeing what could be done with them and how they could be utilized. Now, to answer the gentleman's question specifically, here is a tract of land of a thousand acres—cut-over land. A man can not use it except for pasturage, and very little of that.

He can not afford to hold it. It is assessed for $1 or $2 on the assessment roll. Here is a tract where a man has a sav mill where there is Government timber. The timber may cover a hundred acres, and is more valuable, possibly, than the thousand acres that the man owns in the forest reserve, so that they will estimate the value of the privately owned thousand acres and they will estimate the value of the timber on the 100 acres of Government land, and if it is equal they will exchange. If not, they will give the best timber for the amount of his land.

Now, this is the crux of the thing: When this privately owned land, cut over, is exchanged they can cut over this 100 acres that they get in exchange under the rules and regulations of the Forest Service, which require them to burn the brush and to leave a young standing growth of trees on that land, which in from 30 to 60 years will reproduce forest trees of a size of from 2 to 3 feet in diameter, which can be harvested again. That is the object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. What advantage is it to the Government to have its national forests cut and exchange for land that has already been deforested?

Mr. RAKER. This is the situation: The man owns his land, privately owned land. It is cut over. He has reaped the benefit of the trees that are on it. You can not take it from him. Now, that is intermingling and adjoining with the forest lands, as indicated on this map. It requires expense to guard that land, which belongs to private individuals. If the farmer cuts on it, he does not care; he pays no attention to the reforestation. But if the Government does it, it adds but little expense. It gets a return from grazing permits on the land. It protects the watershed of that country and it turns over to that man timber or land in that forest reserve or in the State to the estimated value, as appraisers would fix it, of that land, and thereby gets a larger tract, saves extra expense, and is in a position to reforest that land and protect the stream flow, which is the life, the salvation, and the future prosperity of the Western States. As illustrated yesterday before the Committee on Arid Lands, many hundreds of years ago there was a dam in Arabia that was 2,000 feet long and 200 feet high. Those people built it to irrigate their lands. They cut off all the timber back of this reservoir. The water flow ceased and the people moved away, and the dam became useless and the land below became a barren waste, as history now demonstrates. That is what stares Oregon and California and Nevada in the face to-day. There is a great tract of millions of acres that the Government can get at a reasonable price, and in 50 years there will be a growth of timber on that land that will enhance its value a hundredfold.

Mr. WALSH. But in other sections of that same national forest there will be other spots where the timber has been cut off. You are seeking to protect the watershed, as I understand the gentleman's explanation, by providing for a tree growth on these areas which are now in private ownership, and giving the owners some land elsewhere in the national forest and permitting them to cut timber?

Mr. RAKER. No. I want to make that plain, so that the House will not overlook that.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman should get his explanation straight. What is the advantage to the Government? The gentleman has stated the advantage to the individual.

Mr. RAKER. As to the advantage to the Government, it saves expense in the administration of the land by adding a larger territory, which adds to the Government's property, which will increase in years by virtue of the exchange, where the individual can not do it.

To answer the question of the gentleman directly, as to the land that is transferred to the individual by the Government, the land that has timber on it, a provision will be made in the deed or patent that he must cut the timber on that land according to rules and regulations now or hereafter adopted by the Department of Agriculture, which will provide for a continued growth of the timber on that land.

Mr. WALSH. Will that be better for the watershed, continued growth of timber, than the present forest that is already there?

Mr. RAKER. Just the same.

Mr. WALSH. Well, if it is just the same, then what difference does it make whether they get this privately owned land or not?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman overlooks this fact, that here is a tract of privately owned land, 100 acres, that is cut over.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. And, my dear sir, it is as barren as this floor, whereas if it had been cut over under proper rules and regulations, as it was cut from 30 down to 5 years ago, there would be a stand of timber on there from a foot to 3½ feet in diameter.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman mean to say that a timber company, cutting timber out there, cuts down everything, including the small growth?

Mr. RAKER. I intend to say that I have seen thousands and tens of thousands of acres where they have cut down everything, and if there was anything there that they did not cut down, fire came along and swept it all off, and there is no growth there to show to-day except the shrubbery that has grown up.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman mean to say that unless we put it in charge of the Federal Government and Federal officeholders, nature will not follow its customary course and reforest cut-over land?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Has not experience shown that it does not take the stimulus of Government ownership to make trees grow and replace the trees that have been cut down? My observation has been nearly as extensive as that of the gentleman as to cut-over land. I come from a country where the lumber companies have cut over land, and they would be very much delighted, and some of them have been pursuing the policy of exchanging cut-over lands for timbered lands, or getting the Government to hold the land and furnish the capital investment for them, and then they buy the timber as they want it.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman does not grasp the situation.

Mr. WINGO. I think I do grasp the situation.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman grasps the situation as it applies to his country, but he must remember that land in Arizona, New Mexico, California, and Nevada, and in Oregon and Washington on the eastern side of the mountains does not reproduce the forest by the method that the gentleman suggests.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WINGO. Does it require Government ownership in order to make trees reproduce?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Let me answer the gentleman from Arkansas. The reason why the land will not reforest itself is because the private individual has cut the timber from the land in such a way as to end it. If it had been cut over properly in the first instance and the young trees allowed to stand and the brush piled and burned, the young trees would not have burned; but on 90 per cent of all this land they have left the stumps, the limbs, and the tops. They have caught fire. The young trees are like oil, and the fire comes in there and sweeps everything clear. Now, every piece of land that a private individual gets from the Government, if he gets it under this exchange, he receives on condition that he must cut the timber on it under rules and regulations which will leave a remaining stand of timber. When land has been cut over improperly it is done and gone. We can not remedy that.

Mr. WINGO. The land is still there.

Mr. RAKER. The land is there, but the young trees are eliminated.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I should like to state that timber ripens the same as grain ripens. As I understand it, the timber that they cut in these cases in exchange is very largely the ripe timber. It reaches the point where decay begins, and the time comes when it is better for the country and better for the forest to have that timber cut than it is to leave it. That is the sort of timber, very largely, that they give in exchange for these cut-over lands, and they also specify that the smaller timber must be left standing. It is this smaller timber which is often destroyed when these lands are not cut under proper supervision. Under the rules and regulations of the department the brush must be burned and the land must be left in such a condition that it will soon become a worth-while forest again.

But I wanted to call special attention to the fact that we cut the mature timber the same as we cut a field of grain and then seed it again in order that we may have another crop.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. What is this privately owned land being used for now?

Mr. RAKER. The only thing it is being used for, so far as I have known, in any place is for the small amount that the owner may get from leasing his land.

Mr. WALSH. For what purpose?

Mr. RAKER. For stock-raising purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Can they raise stock in the forests?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; surely; the finest cattle and horses on earth and the largest deer in the world. The deer there weigh as much as 320 pounds.

Mr. WALSH. Are they raising them on this privately owned land?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. That is not the forest. I understand the gentleman says that the trees on this privately owned land have all been cut?

Mr. RAKER. That is right.

Mr. WALSH. And now the stock graze on it?

Mr. RAKER. They graze on it; but the greater value has been eliminated by virtue of the destruction of the vegetation underneath by the fires which have run over the ground.

Mr. WALSH. Can they raise stock in a national forest?

Mr. RAKER. The national forests vary from the lowlands to the highlands as to the kind and character of grass and the abundance of feed. In some particular tracts of that land, where there are trees from 3 to 6 feet in diameter every 20 feet apart, there is not so much feed. Again, you will find places where the trees are 30 or 40 feet apart, and there you will find an abundance of grass and more or less shrubbery growing up, and it makes exceptionally fine pasture.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PARRISH. I observe on page 1, line 5, of the bill that it provides for the exchange of land within 6 miles of the exterior boundaries of the existing national forest. In other words, you allow them to go beyond the exterior boundaries as much as 6 miles according to this bill. I see also that the Secretary of the Interior—who by the way lives in New Mexico and is familiar with the general conditions there undoubtedly—recommends very specifically and definitely as follows:

I therefore recommend that the bill be amended so as to confine its operations wholly to lands, public and private, within the exterior boundaries of existing national forests in the State of New Mexico.

In other words, it appears to me that the Secretary of the Interior would confine this bill within the existing boundaries of national forests, and yet you are attempting by this bill to extend it at least 6 miles beyond those boundaries.

Mr. RAKER. There are other reports on file by the Secretary, and several other bills have been passed.

Mr. PARRISH. If there are other reports, it seems to me they ought to be included, because this is dated July 30, 1921.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and then I will answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman explain, if this is privately owned land, how is it that the Secretary of the Interior gets into the transaction. If the lands are privately owned and this is a national forest, how does he get into it?

Mr. RAKER. There are three theories, all legitimate. First, in this bill, in particular, if there is any land outside of the present boundaries of the national forests, there is some Government land in addition to the privately owned land, and therefore the Secretary of the Interior has control of any land that is public land not within the reservation; second, the Secretary of the Interior is at the head of the department that must issue the patent. So, after the Secretary of Agriculture investigates, the Secretary of the Interior must investigate, because his department must be satisfied before the patent is issued. That is the reason the Secretary of the Interior is interested in this proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Are these Government lands outside the national forests to be exchanged upon the same basis as the privately owned lands?

Mr. RAKER. That is not involved in the 6-mile limit.

Mr. WALSH. It is all within the 6-mile limit or within the forest reserve.

Mr. RAKER. Owned by private individuals, but if there is any land within the 6 miles of the present exterior boundary of any forest, that is not added to the forest reserve by this bill.

Mr. WALSH. What is done with it?

Mr. RAKER. It stays there; it is public land.

Mr. WALSH. How can it be exchanged?

Mr. RAKER. It can not be exchanged. I see what the gentleman is driving at, and it is well put. On page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, there is a provision, and it is in none of the other legislation, that authorizes these men who own the land within the forest reserve—and in this bill it will be within 6 miles of a forest reserve—to exchange that land for any public land in the State of New Mexico that is public, nonmineral, nonirrigable, and not suitable to raise agricultural crops except grass.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman from California in favor of that?

Mr. RAKER. No; I am not. I am in favor of these other features—we have thrashed them out in the committee so as to protect the Government in regard to minerals. There has been an effort to have the lands exchanged and the mineral rights preserved. I have said to all owners, "You have got the value of this land, and now you want to turn it back and reserve the mineral rights. That is all wrong. All the land included in the forest reserve a gold miner can go on, and if he finds it, extract it. You have taken a tract of land there, and now you want to reserve the mineral rights, turn it over to the Government, and you ought not to have that right." The committee in all of the bills except one has stricken out that provision, so that the Government will be protected.

Mr. WALSH. If that is a good policy, why should there be an exception?

Mr. RAKER. There should not be, but one bill got through last year by oversight.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman suggest any reasons why he is opposed to the change?

Mr. RAKER. I can; but I do not like to take up so much time. This whole subject I have lived with for years and spent my time with it. I want the present legislation so that it will open up this land to proper reforestation and prevent the devastation and destroying of the great reservoirs of water affecting the future prosperity of our State and its people.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The gentleman is giving us a lot of information which I am glad to get. He has stated that these men exploit the land and care for nothing about it except the timber, and that it is desirable for the Government to get in as much of it as possible. Why, in this exchange should not the Government only exchange the timber rights and not give the land?

Mr. RAKER. The bill provides for that. There may be a piece of land at the edge of a reserve and you could give him the land and it would do no hurt. If we can return and bring back the land for a nominal price, reforest it, turn over a small part of the timber to the private individual and benefit him, and, on the other hand, benefit the Government, why should not we do it?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If the individual does not want anything but the timber, why not do that?

Mr. RAKER. They can do it, and I believe they will do it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The bills says, on page 2, lines 3, 4, and 5:

The Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber within the national forest in the State of New Mexico.

What does the grantor give in exchange?

Mr. RAKER. The grantor, for instance, gives 10,000 acres of cut-over land, which is worth from $1 to $2.50 an acre. He will deed that land to the Government, 10,000 acres, for some timber over here which he will be permitted to cut under Government regulations, of the same value as his land, both being appraised.

Mr. BOX. As I understand it, he will give a fee simple title to his land in exchange for timber on the Government lands?

Mr. RAKER. Exactly.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. It seems to me that one phase of this is being left out of the discussion, which is worthy of consideration. Part of the duty of the Government is to encourage private enterprise and the proper use of our resources. If this timber is there, ready and ripe, as the gentleman said a while ago, it seems to me it is good business to exchange that timber to somebody who will cut it down and use it and put it on the market and bring it into commerce, provided the Government is getting land for that timber that is of as much value as the timber.

Mr. RAKER. The lands must be of as much value.

Mr. LOWREY. And that will mean large things to the country in the future.

Mr. RAKER. I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi to the fact that that has been one of the things that we have been trying to do. We have been trying to go into these great forests and cut the ripe timber as well as the dead and down timber and relieve the forests from the danger of fire, and get in return for that lands that will be of inestimable value in years to come. Every transaction must be gone over by the Secretary of Agriculture and must be gone over by the Secretary of the Interior, with their force, and it must be a matter of value for value. It is all optionable.

Mr. LOWREY. I agree with the gentleman entirely. I am for his proposition. I just wanted to bring the attention of the House to the thought that this tends to encourage private enterprise and commercial operation with the timber that is there, ready, and provides for the bringing on of more timber that will be there for the same purpose later on, and that, therefore, will add to the general prosperity as well as to save the watershed. It tends to conservation along all lines, it seems to me.

Mr. RAKER. Much of this land now is held by large concerns. The Government wisely made these reservations. They own this most valuable timber, and much of it is ripe and dead and down timber. There are men from one end of the country to the other who are placing small sawmills in this timber owned by the Government and cutting it. The Government marks the dead tree that the man can cut or the down tree that he can cut, and they are cutting under regulations, and the local communities are being supplied with lumber that they could not otherwise get.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the practice on the part of the owners of the privately owned lands in the national forests after they have stripped the land of the timber? Do they abandon the land to the State or anyone who may purchase it for taxes, or do they continue to pay taxes on it and use it?

Mr. RAKER. There is a varied experience, but it all comes down to about the same condition, depending somewhat where the land is located and also the elevation of the land. I want the committee to bear in mind that practically all of this land involved in this bill is of pine, spruce, cedar, black and white pine. That is not generally agricultural land. It is not of the character of the hardwood land of the South and the East. Therefore there is but a small amount of this character of cut-over land to which these reserves apply, except a small strip along the Pacific Ocean, where the redwood grows, and in Oregon and Washington, west of the mountains, where the water flows to the sea. To answer the gentleman's question, they cut over the land and usually left the tops lying on the ground. As they went on, these tops and limbs and stumps stayed there, and eventually a fire would come along, and it would leave it as clean as this floor. It became then practically a public common. People used the land as they saw fit. A man paid a little taxes on it, because he kept it with the rest of his land. Sometimes it went back to the State, and before the tax deed was executed he paid his taxes. That has been the general condition of all of the privately owned cut-over land in California with the exception of a few instances in the last few years.

Since the forest reserves have been inaugurated the man who owns the land within the forest reserves has a right to place a sufficient number of stock on the land that would feed off that tract of land in comparison to other tracts of land in forest reserves. As a result, the sheepman, the horseman, the cattleman goes to Smith or Brown, who owns large tracts of land in the forest reserves, and rents the land for one, two, or three years, and that gives him a right in the forest reserves which he could not otherwise obtain, and the first man gets enough rent from the land in that way to pay the taxes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So it is not the policy, as was the case years ago in northern Wisconsin, when the large lumbermen stripped the land of lumber, to throw it back onto the State and abandon all title to the land, and allow private parties to get a tax deed to it?

Mr. RAKER. No. I think only in a very few instances have the lands been allowed to go back in that way. Some have gone back, but not much.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct a further inquiry to the new policy in respect to which the gentleman called the attention of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MONTOYA], and that is granting a right to a person to exchange abandoned forest land for other Government land outside of the national forest. I have read that amendment and considered it, and I really rather sympathize with the policy. The gentleman says that there are good reasons that can be advanced why that should not we pursued. Will not the gentleman advance reasons why we should not adopt this policy and permit the Government to exchange privately owned land outside the reserves for the abandoned lands in the reserves?

Mr. RAKER. One reason is that the public generally is opposed to this general exchange. We had so much of it under a prior law that we are afraid of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Which prior law?

Mr. RAKER. Under the lieu land law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman refers to the vice of the lieu land law, where there was no limitation as to the value.

Mr. RAKER. This allows a man who owns a tract in a forest reserve to deed his land to A, B, or C, who will come along and take up, without resistance or otherwise, strips or tracts of land that practically control great areas of public land, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. STAFFORD. I must confess I do not follow the reasoning of the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. I may have been quite obscure and I will answer further.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. We are trying to get rid of the privately owned lands in Government forest reserves. Does not the gentleman from California think it would be a good way of disposing of this matter by only giving the right to cut the timber and not give title to the land after the timber is cut?

Mr. RAKER. No; I am——

Mr. ARENTZ. We will have the same thing over again we have now if you do not do this.

Mr. RAKER. No; I am thoroughly wedded and convinced from what I have been told and what I have read and what I have seen that the man who gets a title from the Government, and that does not seem to have been impressed upon the committee this morning—the man who gets title to one or any number of acres of land now owned by the Government will get it under a reservation that he must cut his timber off the land under rules and regulations now in force or hereafter adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ARENTZ. But the mere fact that a man owns 160 or 320 or 1,000 acres of land in the heart of the reservation gives him the right to do as he pleases on that 160 or 1,000 acres——

Mr. RAKER. No; it does not.

Mr. ARENTZ. He does as a general rule.

Mr. RAKER. And the forest service is never going to deed back to the Government a piece of land in the heart of a reserve that will give any man control of that reserve.

Mr. ARENTZ. That is just one——

Mr. RAKER. That is one of the policies. Now, a little further, in answer to the gentleman's question, we get along nicely. I do not like to oppose it, but neither department has recommended it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the department at any time adversely reported on it?

Mr. RAKER. There are so many things in a man's mind I can not answer offhand.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I read it I could not see any objection; in fact, I could see some reason for the Government transferring in exchange for useless, denuded privately owned land in forest reserves other lands outside the forest reserves rather than giving them the value of the timber, which is just the same as money, which can be sold on the public market by the Forest Service.

Mr. RAKER. No. That is a nice statement to make; now listen——

Mr. STAFFORD. I thank the gentleman for his compliment.

Mr. RAKER. I know the gentleman made the statement in fine shape and it sounds good, but the facts are that the timber on the land is so situated that you can not get it to market. Only the man who has his mill or land adjacent can get it. You nor I nor anybody else could go in there as an independent enterprise and cut that timber.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the Forest Service is cutting down matured, dead, and down timber and selling it to privately owned mills and having the money swell the Treasury reserve, and instead of doing that they just give the owner of the privately owned denuded land, which is worthless or worth $1 an acre, can not be sold, has no salable value to speak of—instead of giving the cash they give them that which is equivalent to cash.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman knows, I know, everybody knows, that the man who gets his land in a forest reserve will take its value for timber within the reserve. He will never exchange for land outside; he will sell to some speculator——

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course he will accept timber——

Mr. RAKER (continuing). Who wants to get a tract of land to shut him or shut me or you out of getting a homestead? That is the proposition, and when we give him matured timber, or dead and down timber, and require him to cut it according to rules and regulations it will not interfere with anybody, but if we give him the right to exchange these great vast tracts of cut-over land for the land out in the valleys and other places that is Government land, we are just taking from the individual who wants a desert claim or a homestead the opportunity of getting in there.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to compliment the gentleman on the fact that he has advanced at last some reason for his position on this amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I want to thank the gentleman and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield me some time?

Mr. RAKER. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. WINGO. I would like 10 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. How much time has the gentleman from California?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes, which he has yielded to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I realize the futility of saying anything against a bill that is intended to add to the burdens of the Treasury by turning lands over to these very few gentlemen who have the impression that the next generation will go to the bow wows if we do not plunder the present generation for their benefit. One reason why I wanted to say a few words was that the estimable Secretary of Agriculture seems to have the impression that my complaint against him is that he does not personally sign letters written in answer to my personal letters to him. Of course such is not my complaint. I do not care a rap about his personal attention to his letters, but I want him to take a personal interest in the transactions of the forest reserves in Arkansas, and not blindly rely upon the Forestry Bureau; and when a Member of Congress writes a letter under "personal" cover to him complaining of a bureau, not to pass that letter on unnoticed to the offending bureau and then blindly sign the answer prepared for him. It is not expected that a bureau charged with a waste of public funds will admit the charge, and as the present Secretary admits he does not see a letter addressed to him by a Member of Congress marked "personal," but that the letter is passed on in a routine way to the bureau complained of, I have little hope of arousing his interest sufficiently to cause him to give the matter the attention sought.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman states he has brought this matter to the attention of the department and the Secretary has turned the matter over to the very gentleman against whom the complaint was brought?

Mr. WINGO. Here is what we have done: As the gentleman recalls, I started eight years ago my fight on this vicious policy as applied to my district. I know what it is doing. I know the waste of public funds. Even conceding the feasibility of the forestry scheme out in the Rocky Mountains or in the Appalachians, yet, as applied to the reserves in my State, it is a farce and a waste of public funds.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Were the forest reserves in Arkansas purchased under the public domain or under the Weeks law?

Mr. WINGO. First out of public domain, and then by additions under the Weeks Act. I wrote a letter to the present Secretary and put a personal cover on it, both outside and in, and he never saw that letter until I made a statement on the floor the other day about his lack of attention to the matter. Then he investigated and called for my letter, which had gone to the Forestry Bureau, the very thing of which I was complaining. He thinks that I am complaining that he does not sign his letters personally, which, of course, I do not. Instead of waking up and giving some independent attention to the matter he permits his office to send the complaint over to the Forestry Bureau, and they provide an answer. I am not caring who signs his letter, but I want him to know something about what is being done—give some personal attention to the Forestry Service operations.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman says that for years he has been pegging away at this proposition. I wonder if he received the same attention from the previous Secretaries.

Mr. WINGO. I received better attention; but I had to pursue the same course that I am pursuing now. I had to continually pursue the matter. Of course, the present Secretary has fallen a victim to the same system that surrounded his predecessors. They necessarily have to depend on men of experience in the department, because it is a physical impossibility for a Cabinet officer to attend to mere routine or petty details; but when his attention is personally directed to the fact that a bureau under him is wasting funds or not pursuing a correct policy, it occurs to me the wise Cabinet officer will not permit a system of handling his mail whereby he will not see the complaint but have it pass on to the bureau in question instead of having some independent inquiry made, free from the control of those subject to inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not the usual course, if the complaint comes in about a subordinate official in an executive department, for the chief of that department to say to his subordinates, "How about this matter? How about this complaint that is made about your division or bureau?" It seems to me that would be the beginning of his investigation.

Mr. WINGO. I may be in error, but it seems to me if I were a Cabinet officer and a gentleman would write me a letter to the effect that public money was being wasted in one of my bureaus, I should find some way to quietly look into it. And then, if I had found things that I thought needed explanation, I would send for the chief of that particular bureau. I would not send down to him a complaint that was made to me in a personal capacity and then sign and accept his answer without any question and without further inquiry.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understand the gentleman has been complaining of the operation of the Secretary under the Weeks Act.

Mr. WINGO. I have been complaining of the operations of the Forestry Bureau. The Secretary will not act at all. He says it is not his independent business to act, but that matters complained of are under control of the commission.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is the Weeks Act that applies to your State?

Mr. WINGO. I think so. I made two or three attacks on this question in six or eight weeks. The last time I got up here some very able, learned gentlemen who were familiar with the law said that I did not know what I was talking about if I thought the Weeks Act controlled the operations I complained of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-seven minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Under this bill, unless I am mistaken, you propose to extend the boundary lines of this reserve 6 miles farther. Is not that true, that you propose to make this forest reserve 6 miles larger? You are going to take up a tract of land here and another there. A gentleman in discussing this subject this morning stated that all they wanted to do is to take up a tract of land here inside of a reserve. Of course, there is a fine argument in that. I can see that. You increase the reserve, and then you take in private lands and again increase the reserves, and then take in further private lands and increase the reserve again.

Who is it that wants to do this? Are they practical men, who view both sides of the question? No. It is done by men who have a hobby in life, who really believe, as does our estimable friend from California [Mr. RAKER], that this whole continent will be a blistering, arid waste unless you maintain these forest reserves. You heard the gentleman state that unless the Government took the land over these trees would not grow up again. Oh, the wonderful effect of public ownership when its dews fall upon this land! In the vivid imagination of these conservationists there is a land burned, dry, treeless, arid, where a tree will not start; but just put it into the care of this conservation bunch, and then, behold, the desert blooms; behold, the arid sands become fertile soil, and there springs forth immediately, as if by magic, a wonderfully fine forest that will furnish timber and fuel for the next generation! Gentlemen, I wish these enthusiastic gentlemen would devote half as much attention to the interests and the welfare of this generation as they do to the next.

Of course, I understand that where in a great watershed there has been a complete devastation in certain instances it might be a good Government policy to go out and reforest that watershed; but to go out and take every little spring branch in Arkansas and include it in a forest reserve and put rangers and other officeholders in charge of it in the name of "conservation" is absurd.

Talk about fires! That is one of my complaints against the Forest Service in Arkansas. You can not get remuneration for damages accruing by fire caused by Government officials. I had at least one case of that kind where the damages can be traced to that source. Of course, those gentlemen will not admit that they were careless. They have an idea that the homesteader within the forest reserve is an intruder and that he has no business there. They claim that it is the farmer's business to get busy when a fire is set on a reserve and be there and stop it when it reaches his land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 42 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question but that there have been grave abuses under the administration of the Weeks Appalachian Mountain System Reserve Act. That act was passed on March 1, 1911. Under the terms of that act it was to expire on June 30, 1915. I am reliably informed that the act in the last Congress was extended.

Under the original provisions of the act we created a commission consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and two Members of the Senate, to be selected by the President of the Senate, and two Members of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the Speaker, who were to comprise the National Forest Reserve Commission. You will notice that there were four Members of Congress, a majority of that commission, who under the terms of the act were authorized to select and designate the lands that were to be selected. Already the commission has purchased some abandoned farm lands adapted more for summer resorts than for forest reserves on the top of the Appalachian Mountains in New Hampshire and Vermont; some in West Virginia and some in Georgia and North Carolina; a small limited tract in Alabama and three various tracts in Arkansas, to which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has referred.

This law was passed under the spell of conservation. You wanted to conserve the forests of the country by having the National Treasury come to the rescue of some old abandoned lands which were not suitable and which were more suitable for resort purposes than for conservation. Well, the result, as anticipated by some who knew the profligacy of Government operation, has been waste upon waste of public funds. When the matter was first called to my attention here some weeks ago by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] I thought it was time that this matter should be presented to the attention of the newly created Director of the Budget. If the Committee on Appropriations, with their tremendous burdens, had not been apprised of the wasteful extravagance under the operation of the Weeks law, I thought it was my duty to call the attention of the Director of the Budget to the charges made by the gentleman from Arkansas, so that in the preparation of the budget for the coming year they would not be included in the appropriation without the director having notice in advance of these practices which were charged by the gentleman from Arkansas.

I am glad to state that the Bureau of the Budget had already decided not to expend any money for this purpose, so that it was not through any instrumentality of mine that these practices will be checked, or that the appropriation that might have been recommended will not be recommended. I received a letter from the office of the Director of the Budget stating that they had already decided not to include one dollar of expenditure for this purpose. I wish to commend the budget officer for that saving of $1,000,000 which would otherwise have been expended in the needless purchasing of waste land. We all know what the practice is. The National Forestry Service, just like every other arm of the Government, wish to extend and magnify their position and activities. That is the usual rule as found in all departments and all establishments of this Government, that every bureau chief wishes to enlarge and extend his own activities and to magnify his position. So the officers connected with the Forest Reserve wish to extend their activities by having more forest reserves over which they can have control.

The bill pending before us is different from any which has been presented to Congress heretofore, in this respect, that instead of providing for the taking over of special forest reserves it extends to all the national forest reserves in New Mexico. Heretofore the committee has determined, I assume, whether certain lands in particular forest reserves were proper to be taken over, and as to whether that policy should be adopted by Congress; but in this bill the committee surrendered that discretion, that power, and introduced a bill of general scope, applying to all the national forest reserves in New Mexico. As the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. MONTOYA] has very well informed the committee, there are six of these forest reserves in that State, comprising more than 8,000,000 acres, of which 1,178,000 acres, as stated by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], are owned by private owners, lumber companies, and the like. These private holdings are not limited to small holdings, but are generally large tracts which have been purchased from the original homestead entrymen.

As I stated a little while ago, in Wisconsin when the big lumbermen went and stripped the northern part of the State of its white pine they threw the land onto the market; did nothing more with it. They had taken the fruitage of the soil and then they said to the State, "Take it for what it is worth." Out in the West some of this land has been held by the private owners after it has been cut over, because it is suitable for grazing; but I question whether we should adopt the policy of authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to take over all of the abandoned privately cut-over lands in forest reserves merely for the purpose of magnifying the power and functioning of this forest reserve system.

Years ago Representatives from far Western States criticized the National Government for including public lands in forest reserves, and the argument advanced by them at that time was that it removed property from private ownership, and therefore from taxation, thereby lessening the resources of the State to support its institutions; but now a new policy has been adopted by the committee, under which it is the purpose to include virtually everything within the exterior boundaries of the forest reserves and within 6 miles outside those exterior boundaries.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. Does not the right to exchange mean the right to give away the property of the public? Does not the right to exchange public lands for privately owned lands mean in effect the right to give away public property?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is virtually the purchase by the National Government of abandoned privately owned lands, purchased by giving the owner, who can not find any other customer for it, Government land of equal value or timber of equal value. Every person who has received the full value of his land by stripping it of its timber, having no further need for it, is only too glad to find a willing purchaser like the Government to whom to sell the land at the salable value, $1 or $2 or $2.50 an acre, by receiving in lieu either lands or, if he does not care for lands, then timber; and if he takes timber, of course it will be salable timber. That is the whole policy under this provision.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I have had some experience in connection with forest reserves in the Black Hills in my State. Does not the gentleman think it would be good policy for the Government to acquire the privately owned lands which are situated within the boundaries of forest reserves? It seems to me the main objection to this bill is that it permits the Government to obtain tracts 6 miles away from the exterior boundaries of the national forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman agree with me that when we exchange timber for these privately owned lands in forest reserves, the National Government is virtually purchasing those lands with something of value?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, should it be our policy, in these times when we are hard pressed for money, to buy these private lands from the owners with timber that can be sold readily in the market?

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BOX. As to the lands outside of the forest reserves, does not the Government in buying them assume the burden of the obligation to police and reforest them?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, we have a bill here reported from the committee which will be considered later in this House, a bill reported by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], in which he wants to take over an entire new tract into a forest reserve, where the land included within the outside boundaries aggregates 130,000 acres, of which the unappropriated public lands scattered through amounts to only 13,000 acres. Get the idea and the proportions—13,000 acres. It is proposed in this bill reported by the committee and on the calendar that we are going to create a new forest reserve adjoining another, where only one-tenth will be owned by the Government, and these privately owned lands are to receive all the protection, airplanes flying all around to discover whether there is a fire—receive all the protection, and it is not to cost them anything—to carry out an Elysian dream of eventually, after the private owners strip their lands of the timber, of having it added to the national domain by stretching a line around the exterior, when it is nearly all owned by private individuals.

I am not opposed to the Government in isolated cases taking over abandoned land where it is for the advantage of the Government, but where you adopt the policy of saying that wherever persons have stripped the land of valuable timber they can come to the Government and say the Government shall take it and give them valuable timber instead, I am opposed to any such policy. I do not think the Government should be in the business of engaging in the purchase of this land. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) accepting the invitation of the Republic of Brazil to take part in an international exposition to be held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922.

NATIONAL FORESTS OF NEW MEXICO.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 28 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, there is a defendant in this court that the Public Lands Committee has not been engaged to defend, and that is the Weeks law. I want the committee to understand that the Public Lands Committee have nothing to do with the operation of the Weeks law, nor has the Weeks law anything to do with the exchange proposed in this bill. They are entirely separate and apart. There is no appropriation provided for under this bill; nor is there an appropriation provided for for the western exchange. Under the Weeks Act the Secretaries, with the approval, and only with the approval, of four Members of Congress, two from the Senate and two from the House, purchase outright privately owned lands needed for the purpose mentioned in the Weeks Act. And in addition to that, there can be no land purchased under the Weeks Act unless the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, which the gentleman represents, consents to the purchase of the land. So I wish you would entirely divorce any objection and any criticism that you may have of the Weeks Act and the operation of the Weeks Act from the exchange operations on the western forests. We are not engaged in defending the Weeks Act. The proponents of that act at the proper time, I assume, will defend it when the occasion demands a defense.

The gentleman from California, Judge RAKER, opposes a very important amendment that the committee inserted in the bill. He intimates that it is without the approval of the department. As a matter of fact, that amendment was brought to us by a representative of the department, and in the committee was modified by certain amendments before it was adopted by the committee. Whether the gentleman from California was present or not when the amendment was adopted, I do not know. The gentleman could have filed minority views against this bill. He could have filed minority views against the Land Office consolidation bill we passed last Wednesday, although in justice to him I will say that he reserved the right to oppose that bill.

The judge is a most valuable member of our committee, and his advice and help is valuable to the committee, and we are warm personal friends; but sometimes I must say that I do not understand him. I do not understand his antics.

I want to be charitable to him, and I know he has a right to exercise his own views in these matters. Sometimes I feel toward him as the old cross-cut sawyer did in the Oregon woods during the war, when a college graduate was sent out to help him. The college graduate got on the other end of the saw, and after they had sawed away for about an hour the old sawyer looked up pityingly and wearily and said, "Sonny, I don't mind your riding on the saw, but I wish you would quit dragging your feet on the ground." [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, the committee has given a good deal of time and attention to this bill and to the general matter of forest exchanges. We feel that we have reported a bill that will safeguard the interests of the General Government. We feel that we have reported a bill that will enable the Forest Service to eliminate from the forests privately owned lands that cause a lot of embarrassment and are a fire menace to the forests. It will eliminate lands over which the Government has no control and lands upon which forest fires frequently originate, because the Government has no control over the private owner. He may leave his slashings on the ground, he may leave an inflammable undergrowth to grow up, and that fire will spread from the privately owned land to the Government lands and timber.

It is the purpose of this bill, as far as possible, to eliminate privately owned land from within the limits of the national forests, and to enable the Government to control as far as possible the entire forest area. Wherever the private owner may have a great amount of privately owned land, interspersed by some Government land, the Government will naturally deed to him that Government land, so that the private owner may have a solid block in one portion of the forest, and at the other end will accept title from the private owner where his sparse holdings are intermingled in the larger Government holdings, enabling the Government to have the land in one end of the forest and the private owner to have his land at the other end of the forest.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, speaking of the old lumberman and the college graduate, the gentleman has not forgotten that he and I went out into the timber of Maryland, when each of us sawed a tree down in 15 minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; but we did not ride on the saw. I recall it very well.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. In just a moment. I want to develop a few ideas along this line. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made some comments upon the broad character of the bill, because it covers all the forests in the State, saying that the committee had heretofore reported separate bills for the separate forests, but that this is a bill giving the right of exchange throughout the State. At the last session of Congress the committee had very full hearings upon a general forest exchange bill. We have now before us coming from the Senate a general forest exchange bill which we may take up for consideration at this session. I think it is better to have a general bill than to come in with separate bills relating to each forest. Last session of Congress we had some 17 or 18 bills pending before the committee, and instead of taking up the time of the House as we are to-day—and we are taking up the entire day with these separate forest exchange bills—we ought to have one bill giving the officials authority to make these general exchanges. The Forest Service, or the Department of Agriculture, has control of our national forests, aggregating 150,000,000 acres and worth more than $1,000,000,000 in money. They have the right to sell every stick of timber on those 150,000,000 acres of national forest, and can not we trust them in making these little exchanges of a few acres here and a few thousand acres there? There has never been the breath of scandal directed toward the Forest Service.

I can say that without fear or successful contradiction. There has never been the breath of scandal directed toward the Forest Service in any of their acquisitions or in any of their sales of land. There have been connected with the service such men as the former Chief Forester, Mr. Graves; his assistant, Mr. Potter; men like Mr. Sherman; and the present Chief Forester, Mr. Greeley, upon whom the breath of suspicion has never fallen.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do not forget Gifford Pinchot.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; and before my service here Mr. Pinchot. Men who could easily retire from the positions they were holding and receive much higher salaries than they have received from the Government, some of them serving the Government at a great personal sacrifice. I think that we can very safely trust to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Forest Service and to the Secretary of the Interior to make these exchanges, guarded as they are guarded by the terms of this bill.

One gentleman asked why we allow them to go out for 6 miles. I will tell you why: Before the forest reserves were created much of the land was taken up by homesteaders or purchased under the timber and stone act, so when the forest reserves were created they drew the lines so as to eliminate from the forests these privately owned lands, and as a result we have jutting into the Santa Fe Forest, for instance, a big gap or tongue of privately owned land, which is natural forest land. It is the desire of the service to incorporate that within the forest. Some of this land they desire to obtain is within 6 miles of the national-forest boundary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has just directed the attention of the House to a tongue of land which apparently is much larger than he has in mind and could not be included within any 6-mile reservation.

Mr. SINNOTT. Any land that they desire they have measured up on the map, and it will be embraced within the 6-mile limit. That matter was carefully considered in the committee. That is the purpose of the 6-mile limit.

So far as the amendment on page 2 of the bill, to which the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] objects, is concerned, it is my purpose to offer an amendment to insert after the word "other," on line 1, page 2, the word "unreserved," to make it absolutely clear that no water-power lands will be transferred in these exchanges. I also purpose to offer another amendment to add this proviso to the bill—

> Provided the United States reserves all of the coal, oil, gas, and other minerals in the land patented hereunder, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, and the patent shall contain such reservations.

Apart from that amendment, the amendment of the committee provides that instead of the Government surrendering lands or timber within the national forests it may patent to the private owner other Government lands, nonmineral, nonirrigable, and not suited to the raising of agricultural crops, except grass. That means that instead of allowing the private owner to retain the holdings within the national forests we will give him the worthless culls that are left in the State—lands that are not capable of irrigation, not capable of raising agricultural crops, and that means land that no one would take up for homestead purposes. We feel that it is better to give the private owner such worthless land than to keep him an owner within the limits of national forests. We want to have the national forests intact as far as possible, solely as Government holdings, and we feel that that amendment will accomplish the purpose.

Whatever may have happened under the Weeks Act, I think I can assure gentlemen that there have been no improvident deals by the Forest Service under the operation of the forest exchange acts. We have one forest in my State for which I got through an exchange act, I think in 1916, and there has not been the exchange of an acre of land in that forest; and why? Because the forestry officers thought the private-land owners were exacting too high a price for their land and there was not an exchange made. Do gentlemen know what is the highest price the Forestry Service has paid for any of this exchange land? The highest price yet allowed was $2.25 an acre according to the testimony of Associate Forester Sherman in the hearings last year on the general exchange bill. Is there any scandal there, is there an improvident deal there? Not at all. Right in my own section there were 160 acres of land that had upon them about 2,000,000 feet of timber. The Forest Service would not and did not allow the private owner a cent for that 2,000,000 feet of Douglas fir timber, because they contended that the timber was more or less inaccessible and had practically no market value, and they allowed him a few dollars for the land and absolutely nothing for the timber. In that case they allowed him $2.25 an acre for the land. That was the testimony of Mr. Carter, forest inspector, last year in the hearings on the general exchange bill. I think we can safely depend upon this service to give us a safe and careful administration of this act.

The scandal referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was the scandal under the old lieu land act of 1897, where there were absolutely no safeguards surrounding the exchange. Under that lieu land act anyone owning an area of land within the national forest had an absolute right to exchange that land for lands outside of the national forest, area for area, not measured by the value of the privately owned land, with no safeguard, no standard, no limitation. If a man had 160 acres within a national forest, he could take 160 acres outside of the national forest.

And that is where the scandal arises; but there has been no scandal under the operations of the various national forests acts providing for the exchanging of land for timber or timber for land on the basis of equal values as proposed in this bill.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. TIMBERLAKE rose.

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The general object of this bill has been stated a number of times here by the gentleman and others that it is for the purpose of consolidating lands in the forest reserves. I have heard some objections offered to the provision in line 5 that these shall not be limited to the boundaries but may be taken within 6 miles. The object is still plain, and it is for the purpose of absolutely consolidating the holdings in the national forests. It is not the purpose to allow lands taken outside of the exterior boundaries, except where it will consolidate them, as was suggested.

Mr. SINNOTT. The statement of the gentleman is correct. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. If this policy is pursued, the result would be to increase the holdings of the Government in forest lands, would it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; it will increase the holdings of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Now, are these private holdings, which are held by people now and which are to be exchanged, taxed by these States?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; they are taxed at the present time.

Mr. WALSH. So that if this policy is pursued we will decrease the amount of taxable land within the States and increase the Government holding of lands?

Mr. SINNOTT. The lands the Government patents to private individuals become subject to taxation. There will be a balance there.

Mr. WALSH. And take lands upon which there is valuable timber for privately owned lands of much larger area and cut off the timber and sell that, and then the land is practically useless, and that is what the private owners have to give to the State in lieu of this other tract that the Government takes?

Mr. SINNOTT. The private owner has both logged-off land and also heavily timbered land, and I would assume the private landowner would be the larger holder of the logged-off land.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think it is a good policy to pursue for the Government to increase its holding of lands and for us to legislate so as to decrease the taxable areas within the States? Should it not be the other way around?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, there has been a good deal of objection in the States to the lands going off the tax roll. We had that up in the committee and there was a good deal of objection to it, but we felt that we could not put a bill through here compelling the Government to continue to pay the taxes.

Mr. WALSH. Well, will the gentleman state some reason? I do not think he stated any reason for a general bill as distinguished from separate bills describing the land or township and range as heretofore; the gentleman stated, of course, we could trust the forester and trust the Secretary of Agriculture and trust the Secretary of the Interior. We could trust them to do a whole lot of things, but we legislate providing they shall be done in a certain way. Now, why should not we continue the policy in respect to the consolidation of forest lands which we have followed for a good many years?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, they were created under a general act. I do not know whether the House or the committee know any more when we have the separate bills up than they would know about it if we had a general act. Now, here is a bill relating to a good many thousands of acres of land. We can not go out there and examine each township or each section. We are absolutely dependent upon the honesty and the integrity of the officials of the Government who come before the committee. If he tells me this township or this section has no timber on it, or that it is worth $5 an acre, I have to believe him. I have no way until the scandal breaks out of ascertaining whether or not he is telling the truth, but we have found them to be truthful.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know what has been the experience in other sections of the country, but I know it has been the experience of some people out in the back-hills country to have a tract of land, wholly severed from the forest reserves, taken over by the Government with private lands all around it, and then to have that tract of land leased to a private owner who has a lot of cattle running upon the general forest reserve and also upon that particular tract, and it has been a source of a great deal of annoyance to people living in and about the particular tract on account of such trespassing cattle and because of the great difficulty of collecting any damages for injuries suffered. It seems to be that if this bill is amended so as to make all newly acquired lands contiguous it would improve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The bill was again read.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "near" and insert in lieu thereof "within 6 miles of."

Page 2, line 1, after the word "land," insert "other Government land, nonmineral nonirrigable, not suited for the raising of agricultural crops, except grass, in said State, or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the second committee amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have not acted upon the first.

The CHAIRMAN. That will come up when the committee amendment is reached.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "compensation," strike out——

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct an inquiry as to the proper practice to be followed. The bill having been read as originally brought over by the Senate and read with House amendments, the bill now being before the committee for amendment, is it the proper procedure to read the first amendment only or to read all the committee amendments and then take action upon them separately?

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair when considering Senate bills for amendment has uniformly permitted all the amendments to be read and then taken them up in the order in which they were read for consideration by the committee.

The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "compensation," strike out "consideration being given to any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, minerals, or easements."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first committee amendment.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the first committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a substitute to the first committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARRISH as a substitute for committee amendment: Page 1, line 5, after the word "within," strike out the balance of the line.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully——

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of order comes too late.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, I will let it go.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to the discussion on this bill, and I can not agree with the policy contained in it. In other words, the effect of this legislation will be to allow the purchase of additional lands from the proceeds of the sale of the forest lands now owned by the Government or from the sale of valuable timber cut from such lands. We have uniformly held heretofore—and that, too, very recently--against the policy of purchasing additional lands, We have held that in the case of lands contracted for by the military and Navy Departments and have refused many times to appropriate money to purchase additional lands. We have laid that down almost as a uniform rule, and yet this bill comes in with a blanket provisioh and permits the sale of timber, which is the equivalent of money, for the purchase of an unlimited quantity of these lands. And, as an additional proposition——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. PARRISH. I will.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. You would dispose of that timber for money?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes; I would dispose of it for money; would sell it for cash and get the benefit of it while we need money so badly to pay the expenses of running the Government.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. You would be opposed to selling it in exchange for land?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes; but you are cutting off timber and buying additional lands, which I believe is contrary to the wishes of Congress and of the American people at this time. That is the reason I oppose this as a general proposition. I believe it is contrary to the wishes of the American people for us now to dispose of any property we may own and buy additional land and put in the Forest Service.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the committee amendment, because it proposes to go beyond the exterior borders of the national forests and allows the exchange of land 6 miles away from the present limits of the national forests. We have on this proposition a positive statement of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fall, who is a resident of the State of New Mexico, who probably knows the conditions of that State as well or better than anybody else, who has studied the conditions in years past, and he has this to say on this question:

I therefore recommend that the bill be amended so as to confine its operations wholly to lands, public and private, within the exterior boundaries of existing national forests in the State of New Mexico.

In other words, in as strong language as can be written he condemns the idea of going beyond the existing exterior borders. And I believe, Mr. Chairman, regardless of the feeling we may have toward this bill, or whether or not we favor the general policy laid down in it, we certainly ought to follow the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior on this matter, especially since he is a man familiar with the conditions we are legislating about.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, which strikes out the committee amendment allowing 6 miles, and also strikes out the Senate provision, which says "or near," and leaves the bill so it will read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the exterior boundaries of any national forest situated within the State of New Mexico.

The amendment I propose is directly in line with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, and an extension beyond that would be violative of his wishes as expressed in his letter printed as a part of the record in this case.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment embodies one of the most important features of this legislation; that is, to obtain legislation that will enable the Government to straighten the exterior boundaries of the forests. If this amendment is rejected, then we will still have these irregular, serpentine, indented boundary lines of the national forests. I think the gentleman is somewhat misled by reading the letter of the Secretary of the Interior. What the Secretary of the Interior was directing the attention of the committee to was to the ambiguous word "near." He was emphasizing the fact that the word "near" was very indefinite; that the courts had decided differently about the word "near"; and that we should not permit them to take lands embraced or described by the word "near." So the committee eliminated the word, and to make it absolutely certain and definite confined the exchange to within 6 miles, because the representative of the Forest Service who came before our committee told us and pointed it out on the map that they could secure all the lands they needed to straighten out the boundary within a 6-mile limit. Therefore I ask that the amendment be rejected.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. Does your bill call for the expenditure of money?

Mr. SINNOTT. Not for a dollar; it provides for an exchange of timber or land for land.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Why could not the word "near" or the words "within 6 miles" be stricken out and the words "contiguous to" be substituted?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, the objection to that is this: One landowner may own a piece of land directly contiguous to the forest, possibly for half a mile; another landowner owns the land a quarter of a mile beyond that. You would have to get them all together at one time if you used the word "contiguous." I can assure the gentleman that we considered that matter very carefully.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I see; I can see the objection to that; but I think the objections to the other are even greater.

Mr. LAYTON. You are going to purchase additional land in order to make your border even?

Mr. SINNOTT. We exchange lands with the private owners.

Mr. LAYTON. Or exchange timber for the land?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. In other words, instead of paying cash, you pay in timber, which is worth cash?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes. It is a kind of trade between parties.

Mr. WALSH rose.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I am not asking the gentleman to yield. I wish to be recognized later in my own right.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. To what extent is it possible that the national forests might be deforested under this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. This will increase the forestation of the national forests. It will enable the Forest Service to take over privately owned lands in the national forests and protect them from forest fires and from trespasses, from cattle and sheep and goats, and permit the vegetation to come up again.

Mr. LITTLE. How much timber might be cut off and removed from them under this?

Mr. SINNOTT. It would depend upon the value of the privately owned land.

Mr. LITTLE. Surely.

Mr. SINNOTT. There are about a million acres of privately owned land in the national forests of New Mexico, as against something like 8,000,000 acres of Government land in the same forests.

Mr. LITTLE. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. Under this, as I understand it, they can make a trade and take off certain timber?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Has anybody made an estimate of what amount of timber might be cut down and removed from Government lands?

Mr. SINNOTT. All told?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not know the value of the Government timber, but the value of the entire forest area is something over a billion dollars.

Mr. LITTLE. How much of that would be cut off?

Mr. SINNOTT. Eventually, they will cut it all off.

Mr. LITTLE. I mean under this law.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no. I do not know the exact stumpage in the forest lands in New Mexico.

Mr. LITTLE. How much under this bill will be taken off?

Mr. SINNOTT. We have no information on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH] might well be adopted in view of any objection to it as expressed by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] having any great weight. Of course, we all realize that you can not draw such pretty pictures on the maps of these forests if the lands are a little jagged, or if a loop is a little serpentine, or if it is a little irregular. But what difference does it make whether the forest is exactly a square tract of land, with the lines running straight, like those of a township, or whether they are irregular?

It seems to me if it is desired to preserve these forests and to reforest these lands for the protection of the watershed, it makes little difference whether the lines run at right angles or not. The objection I have to permitting them to go out 6 miles and to go outside the exterior boundaries is that thereby you are just going to have as many in the future as you have now, if you permit them to go away out 6 miles somewhere and acquire a tract of privately owned land that is not contiguous to or adjacent to the forest reserve; and it seems that the opinion expressed by the Secretary of the Interior, who comes, I think, from the State to which this law will apply, when he says that it ought to be restricted to the exterior boundaries of the forest, might well be observed, because we are told with great vigor many times when an amendment is proposed that it has not even been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and that it does not have his approval, and that for that reason we should not undertake to make any change in the legislation.

Now, here the Secretary of the Interior is on record as saying that the operation of this law ought to be restricted within the exterior boundaries of the national forest, and we are attempting to say that you can go 6 miles distant and acquire some privately owned lands.

The objection to this whole measure is that it is going to increase the holdings of the Federal Government in lands and it is going to decrease the acreage of lands which are now available in the States for taxation purposes. I do not think that we ought to establish the precedent by a general law; at least, as proposed by the chairman of the committee, that we ought to fix the policy that we will continue to increase the land holdings of the Federal Government. On the contrary, we ought to start some time, by some systematic method, under a carefully enacted law, and prepare for releasing this land to the States, in order that it may come within their jurisdiction for taxation purposes and for other purposes. It is only a certain section of the country that has this. But why should that section of the country have withheld from its jurisdiction and dominion vast tracts of land which might well be utilized for public and private purposes and give the State a certain amount of revenue? I know that probably it will make the Pinchots and others of these parlor conservationists see red, but the days of their policies, I think, are rapidly passing. The time is approaching when the Federal Government ought to be relieved of this vast expense now imposed upon it, and we should gradually turn over to the States tracts of land according to a systematic method and permit the States to exercise jurisdiction over them.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the existing parliamentary situation, should not the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Massachusetts understood me in my remarks this afternoon to mean that this 6-mile limit is only for the purpose of straightening out the irregular edges and the serpentine boundaries or sinuosities of these forest reserves, I have been very unfortunate in expressing myself. For instance, I have here a map which I shall show to the committee. There is a big gap of private lands jutting up into this forest. Unless we have this 6-mile privilege, this big gap will still be there projecting into the national forest and constituting a fire menace, a place where private individuals may permit their slashings to remain on the ground and become inflammable and permit the undergrowth to come up and be a continual fire menace to the national forests.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. In a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to refer to that big gap.

Mr. SINNOTT. Regarding the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, I will state that with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, just before our last adjournment we passed a national forest exchange act which permitted them to exchange within 6 miles of the exterior boundaries. The report of the Secretary was in favor of that bill, which permitted them to go within 5 miles of the exterior boundaries. That was changed on the floor to 6 miles, so we have the approval of the Secretary of the Interior to that proposition. As I said before, the only thing that was called to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior and which he had under consideration was the use of the indefinite word "near," and that is what he was adverting to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to refer to that big gap to which the gentleman has made reference, to the provision to include these irregular serpentine boundaries and sinuosities and saw-tooth edges to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. SINNOTT. "Cul-de-sac" was another synonym.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a very good term. I understand that that gap is 12 miles wide. This bill provides for a distance of only 6 miles, so would not that gap still remain?

Mr. SINNOTT. If it is 12 miles wide, the forest lines are on both sides of it, and 6 miles from each edge would reach to the center of the 12-mile area.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then would not this phraseology allow an extension of the exterior boundaries of the forest for 6 miles, and then after the boundaries had been so extended would not the officers of the Forest Service have authority to extend the boundaries another 6 miles?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; then all of this gap would be in the forest.

Mr. STAFFORD. It would all be in the forest reserve. That is the very policy against which Secretary Fall is protesting—against the taking in of outside lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. They would take in the 6 miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. And then having taken in 6 miles that would be in the national forest, and then why could they not extend the boundaries another 6 miles?

Mr. SINNOTT. They would have to give away all the lands within the national forests. Their base lands would give out.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; they are only giving away the timber.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman says they could make a second move of 6 miles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is not the intention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under that language it might be permitted, and the gentleman knows that these forest officials are seeking to extend their powers all they can.

Mr. SINNOTT. Has the gentleman any amendment which would guard against that?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I have an amendment, but I am in hearty sympathy with the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH], and I am following the strong recommendation of Secretary Fall.

Mr. SINNOTT. They would not go beyond the 6 miles. They do not want to destroy the original forest.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I beg to call attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee has apparently overlooked part of the report of the Secretary of the Interior when he says that the only matter he had in mind was the ambiguity of the word "near." I read these words from the report of the Secretary of the Interior:

> Such lands would also, under the provisions of the bill, "become a part of the national forest." This might result in isolated and disconnected tracts of land outside of existing boundaries of national forests becoming a part of such forests, which, in my judgment, would not be advisable, owing to difficulties of administration; also because it would add to existing national-forest areas.
> I therefore recommend that the bill be amended so as to confine its operations wholly to lands, public and private, within the exterior boundaries of existing national forests in the State of New Mexico.

So the Secretary of the Interior had in mind things other than the vagueness of the word "near," on which the gentleman from Oregon would have us understand Secretary Fall's mind was exclusively fixed when he warned against this legislation as proposed.

Mr. SINNOTT. The Secretary of the Interior does not administer the national forests. The Secretary of Agriculture administers them. We took that matter up with the representatives of the Forest Service, and their policy will be not to buy the lands unless they are able to block out the area desired from the different holdings.

Mr. BOX. The words I read have come from the report of Secretary Fall on the advisability of this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out the words "or within 6 miles of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or contiguous thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON to the substitute offered by Mr. PARRISH: On page 1, line 5, strike out the words "or within 6 miles of" and insert in lieu thereof "or contiguous thereto."

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the objections which have already been raised to the committee amendment "within 6 miles of" appeal to me as entirely valid. It does not seem to me that it is good policy for the Government to acquire isolated tracts not contiguous to the existing forest reserve. The purpose of it can be accomplished by providing that the Government may exchange for lands within the forest reserve or which are contiguous to the existing boundaries. In that way you can avoid all objections raised to having isolated tracts here and there that are subject to the rules and regulations of the Forest Service. I do not think that additions not contiguous to the forest reserves should be permitted.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman's amendment really broadens the provision, and under the gentleman's amendment there is no limit to which the department may go provided the lands are contiguous.

The gentleman strikes out the words "within 6 miles" and says "within the contiguous exterior boundary." The gentleman really broadens the 6-mile limit. He places no limit on it.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. There is no limit under the provisions of the bill as amended by the committee.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; it says within 6 miles.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. But after you have taken in the 6 miles you can go another 6 miles.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; we are not going to absurd lengths like that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Neither do I think that under my amendment they would go to absurd lengths.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARRISH) there were—ayes 19, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SINNOTT) there were—ayes 25, noes 15.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 1, after the word "land," insert the following: "or other Government land, nonmineral, nonirrigable, and not suited to the raising of agricultural crops except grass, in said State, or the Secretary of Agriculture may permit the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, as follows:

After the word "other," line 1, page 2, insert the word "unreserved."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "other," insert the word "unreserved."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment is to make clear that water-power lands can not be granted away.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "land," strike out the remainder of line 1, all of line 2 and line 3 down to and including the word "grass."

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to impose on the good nature of the committee, but in support of the amendment I have offered I want to say that it seems to me very unwise, even if you go far enough to allow them to exchange the forest land, to allow them to exchange other Government lands not forest lands as provided in this bill—such as nonmineral, nonirrigable, and not suited to the raising of agricultural crops except grass. I would confine them to the exchange of forest lands and none other. It seems to me this limitation at least should be placed in the bill. The bill as drawn is very broad, and this is an extension of the original provisions of the bill upon which the Secretary of the Interior has not given an opinion so far as anything in the report shows. It looks to me that we are going much too far in this amendment, and I simply ask to strike out that part of the committee amendment including nonmineral and nonirrigable lands so that it will be confined entirely to forest land.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, of course, one of the main purposes of this bill is to exclude from the national forests privately owned land as far as possible. This committee amendment helps it, because instead of giving a private landowner other lands within another part of the national forests, it aims to put him out altogether and give him lands that are nonirrigable and nonmineral that are worth while to settle on. If you are going to make the exchange, you had better get them to take the worthless land, and work that off onto them as far as possible, rather than keep them in the national forest. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. How does the gentleman expect to work off on private individuals worthless Government land? Does not the gentleman know that he must make a contract with the individual; and who ever heard of an individual getting the worst of it when he is trading with the Government?

Mr. SINNOTT. I suggest that the gentleman come out West and see what we do with some of those lumber operators out there.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, in order to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] a question. Is there any reservation under the language which has been employed in the committee amendment of mineral or oil rights upon land which now is not considered mineral land?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Government will only deed nonmineral land; but I have an amendment extending that into the future, so that if mineral lands are discovered hereafter they will not pass to the private owner.

Mr. WALSH. That will be necessary, will it not?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think it is wise to insert, and I am going to offer that amendment at the end of the bill as a new proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "compensation," strike out "consideration being given to any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, minerals, or easements."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, in line 18, by inserting after the word "published" the words "at the expense of the private owner."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 2, line 18, after the word "published," insert "at the expense of the private owner."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that is to make the private owner pay the expense of the publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I now offer another amendment, on line 6, page 1, to insert after the word "the" the word "present," so as to meet the criticism that they might take another series of 6 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 1, line 6, after the word "the," insert the word "present."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the word "existing" would be more accurate in description than the word "present."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to accept that as a substitute for the word "present."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers a substitute for his amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: Page 1, line 6, after the word "the," insert the word "existing."

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to make that substitution?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to ask unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does not the gentleman from Alabama think that the word "present" is more definite than the word "existing"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was not my opinion about it. It was merely a suggestion. As a matter of description "existing," it seems to me, is more comprehensive.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, if you are going to use the word "existing" I think you should retain the word "present."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, I think that would be mere surplusage.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAILE. The gentleman offered as an amendment the insertion of the word "present." I now understand that the word up for consideration is the word "existing." Was that offered as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon offers it as a substitute for his previous amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VAILE) there were—ayes 32, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, was the vote then taken on the word "present" or the word "existing"?

The CHAIRMAN. On the word "existing." The gentleman from Oregon changed his amendment from "present" to "existing."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SINNOTT: At the end of the bill add the following proviso: "Provided further, That the United States reserves all the coal, oil, gas, and other minerals in the land patented hereunder, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, and the patent shall contain such reservations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 920) for the consolidation of forest lands, in or near national forests, New Mexico, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDING CERTAIN LANDS TO MINIDOKA NATIONAL FOREST.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands I call up the bill H. R. 2914:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up the bill H. R. 2914, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2914) to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2914, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2914, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any lands within the following-described areas found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flow may be included within and made a part of the Minidoka National Forest by proclamation of the President, said lands to be thereafter subject to all laws affecting national forests: Sections 36, 35, 26, 23, 24, 13, 14, 11, 12, 2, and 1, township 13 south, range 23 east; sections 36, 35, 25, 26, 23, 24, 13, and 14, township 12 south, range 23 east; sections 31, 30, 19, 18, 7, and 6, township 13 south, range 24 east; sections 31, 30, 18, 29, 20, 17, 19, 16, 21, 28, 27, 26, 24, and the south half of 23, township 12 south, range 24 east; section 19, township 12 south, range 25 east; sections 16 and 20, township 13 south, range 25 east; sections 25, 26, 27, 34, 35, 36, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 28, and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 33, township 13 south, range 224 east; and sections 1, 2, and the north half of section 3, township 14 south, range 24 east, all of the Boise meridian.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause on page 1 down to and including line 18 on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That any lands within the following-described areas found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flow may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be included within and made a part of the Minidoka National Forest by proclamation of the President, said lands to be thereafter subject to all laws affecting national forests: East half of section 1, east half of section 12, northeast quarter and south half of section 13, sections 24, 25, and 36, township 13 south, range 23 east; section 17, east half of section 18, northeast quarter and south half of section 19, sections 20, 21, south half of section 24, northeast quarter and south half of section 26, south half of section 27, sections 28, 29, 30, and 31, township 12 south, range 24 east; sections 6, 7, 18, 19, 30, and 31, township 13 south, range 24 east; south half of section 19, township 12 south, range 25 east; and west half of section 20, township 13 south, range 25 east, Boise meridian, Idaho: Provided, That the inclusion of any of the aforesaid lands in the Minidoka Forest shall not affect adversely any valid application or entry pending at the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for adding about 14,000 acres of public land to the Minidoka National Forest, in the southern portion of Idaho. Under the act of March 3, 1891, the President was given authority to withdraw public lands covered with timber from entry and set them aside as forest reserves. In making those selections the Secretary of Agriculture was supposed to examine the lands as to their character before the proclamation was submitted to the President for his approval, but the haste of those in charge to get into the national forest reserves all of the land they possibly could the examination that should have been made was in many instances made on the map and not made by a personal examination of the land. As a result great sections of land were taken into the forest reserves that should never have been included, and a great deal of land was left out that should have been included. On account of the rapidity with which these forest reserves were created much opposition arose among the western Senators and Representatives to this broad authority which was given to the President, and as a result in 1912 a law was passed providing that no further forest reserves should be created in the States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, and Wyoming except by act of Congress. This law makes it necessary to come to Congress to have included in some of the national forests certain lands which should have been included when the forest reserves were originally established. When the Minidoka Forest Reserve was established certain well-timbered lands adjoining the forest should have been embraced in the reserve in order to protect the stream flow, but they were not so included, and this bill contemplates adding to the Minidoka Forest, on the western side of the forest and also on the eastern side of the forest, the lands described in the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If this bill becomes a law will it apply to privately owned land or is all the land that is described now owned by the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It only applies to public lands. There may be some privately owned land within the area, but the title will not be disturbed in any way but will continue to remain in the present owner.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The bill does not state that only the public domain should be added to the national forest.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is not necessary to so state.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Just a moment—but seems to authorize somebody—the Secretary of Agriculture—to acquire all the property within those limits?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Well, it is very well understood that you can not take title to land away from a private owner, and it is not necessary to except these individual holdings. The last paragraph of the bill provides:

That the inclusion of any of the aforesaid lands in the Minidoka Forest shall not affect adversely any valid application or entry pending at the date of the approval of this act.

If title has already passed to a private individual, any act of Congress which we could pass would not take that title from him, and in order to protect those who have initiated entry upon public lands this proviso has been incorporated in the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman from Idaho is right in saying this simply protects those who have initiated, those who have made a start in the line and direction of entry upon the public domain, but the bill carries general authority to some official to acquire all the property within certain limits, whereas the intention of the bill is simply to add a part of the public domain to a forest already established.

I doubt the wisdom of the bill in its present form. The only way by which title to private land can be acquired is by purchase.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The word "acquire" does not occur in the bill, and it does not authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to take over privately owned lands.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The bill is broad and carries with it authority to acquire, and it may be so construed.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill was drawn by the legal officer of the Department of Agriculture, and it is assumed that it is correctly drawn.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The authority is broad enough for him to do anything he may at any time wish to do.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Private land can not be acquired except by act of Congress.

Mr. VAILE. Will it not be a simple matter to transfer this particular land, which is now a part of the public domain, to the jurisdiction of the other department?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is the intention, but does the bill limit it to that?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Absolutely so, and describes the land by section and range and township that is to be added to the forest.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the amount of public land that is intended to be taken into this forest reserve which is now outside of the exterior boundaries and the amount that is privately owned within the proposed new boundaries?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As the bill was originally introduced it contemplated adding about 32,000 acres of land, within which there were several thousand acres of private land, but the bill as amended confines land to be added to public land almost entirely, and the amount is reduced to 14,000 acres. This land which we propose to add is mostly high ranges and is not susceptible of cultivation for agricultural purposes. Its inclusion in the reserve is necessary to protect the stream flow in those sections.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand, there are very few private holdings in the area that is now intended to be brought in included in the forest reserves?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Very few.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to ask this question: This is already Government-owned land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. The title to the land is in the Government, and this simply transfers the jurisdiction of it from the Secretary of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture. The leasing of this land for grazing purposes will bring a revenue to the Government and there will be no additional expense in connection with the administration of the forest on account of this addition to the forest.

Mr. LAYTON. There is some land, however, to be added to this under the provisions of this bill, not now owned by the Government?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No, sir. This bill does not provide for adding any privately owned land.

Mr. LAYTON. I thought the gentleman said to the gentleman from Wisconsin that there was a little.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is a little private land within the boundaries of this addition to the reserve, but the title is not transferred. It still remains in private ownership.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the committee went over this bill very thoroughly and unanimously reported it, and feel that it ought to be passed.

I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 2914) to add certain lands to Minidoka National Forest and had directed him to report the same to the House with a committee amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Has the Committee on Public Lands any further business?

EXCHANGES WITHIN THE ROUTT NATIONAL FOREST.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands I call up the bill H. R. 2349.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up the bill H. R. 2349, which is on the Union Calendar.

Therefore the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2349, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2349) authorizing the exchange of lands within the Routt National Forest, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands in private ownership within the Routt National Forest which, in his opinion and the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may give not to exceed an equal value of such Government timber, or land, or assignable certificates for timber in any national forest in the State of Colorado as may be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and acceptable to the owner as fair compensation, considering any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, mineral, or easements. Such assignable certificates for timber shall be issued under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, shall be for the agreed value of lands acquired, and shall be acceptable only at their face value when accompanying bids for the purchase of national forest timber or in payment for national forest timber in the State of Colorado when purchased under existing laws and regulations. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become a part of the Routt National Forest.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 15, on page 2, and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the Routt National Forest, Colo., if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the public interests will be benefited thereby and the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of national forest land within the Routt National Forest, or the Secretary of Agriculture may authorize the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber within the national forests of the same State. The value in each case shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests and under direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the Routt National Forest."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], who has been ill for some time, I reported this bill to the House from the Committee on the Public Lands. The committee struck out all after the enacting clause in order to do away with assignable certificates or script and adopted what is now the standard form of legislation for the exchange of lands within the national forests, providing in this case that the exchange must be made within the exterior limits of the forest and that for the land acquired by the United States the Secretary of Agriculture may release lands of equal value within the forest or dispose of timber of equal value, the values in each case to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. The bill is in the usual form. It provides for exchanges in the normal, ordinary way. There is no question involving any lands outside of the limits of the forest, or any public lands, or a material increase in the size of the forest.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to the amount of lands that will be affected by this bill if it should be enacted into law?

Mr. HAYDEN. Unfortunately I have not the exact figures at hand. The only information I can give the gentleman is that I have examined a land office map of the State of Colorado and observed that this is not an exceedingly large national forest, so that probably the area involved in the proposed exchanges would be comparatively small. Inasmuch as the operation of this measure, if enacted into law, can not greatly increase the total area of the forest, there should not be any objection made to the passage of the bill because of the amount of lands that are to be exchanged.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee why, in some of these bills reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, they make provision for the lands that may be exchanged that would be suitable for forest-reserve purposes, and in others they add the language, "suitable for river-flow conservation purposes"?

Mr. HAYDEN. The terms of the legislation vary with the conditions on the forests. There are a number of national forests where the timber-producing area is comparatively small. They cover the headwaters of streams used for irrigation purposes lower down. Therefore the regulation of grazing and timber operations is chiefly important as a means of conserving the flow of water, and it is necessary to so specify in such cases. In this case, where nothing much is involved but timber value, the reference to river-flow conservation could properly be omitted.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from Wisconsin has asked for certain information.

Mr. STAFFORD. I asked for the area that would be affected by this bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. The total area of the Routt National Forest is 819,278 acres, and the national forest proper lies within that area, in which there are 744,261 acres, and other land—that is, private land—covers 75,017 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has no information as to about how much of this 75,000 acres has already been denuded of timber?

Mr. SINNOTT. No. I have no information on that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Gladly.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it a fact that the land to be exchanged is cut-over land, and that the Government is going to give up timberland for it?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has the Government ever, in its exchanges, gotten anything but the land outside the timber?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is exactly what the Government desires to obtain—control of the entire timber-producing area.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it to the advantage of the Government to exchange cut-over land for timberland?

Mr. HAYDEN. No such exchange is proposed.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It would seem from the wording of the bill that the company wants to get hold of land from which to cut timber. Surely the Government does not want to trade timberland for land which has been cut over?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Texas fails to note that the values in each case are to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand that the value is to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture; but the strange part of it is that the Government is always trading off its timberland for nontimberland and getting no money out of it. I never heard of the Government getting any money from it.

Mr. HAYDEN. What advantage would it be for the Government to sell its timber for cash and then proceed to pay cash for forest land? Interspersed among these forest-reserve lands are lands owned by private individuals. The Government wishes to consolidate its holdings. The gentleman must concede that it is clearly to the interest and advantage of the Government to do that for the purpose of better administration if for no other reason.

Mr. WINGO. My friend from Texas seems not to understand this conservation policy. The object is not to give the Government money, but to take over good land and exchange it for land that has been cut over, and then have Uncle Sam grow another crop of timber on the cut-over land and trade it off again.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know how much truth there may be in the observation of the gentleman from Arkansas, but if the companies cut timber they might be willing to pay the Government for the timber, so that the Government would get something out of it.

Mr. HAYDEN. This land, the gentleman should understand, has been cut over once. If the Government grows a second crop of timber it can be disposed of for cash by the Forest Service.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then the Government wants to have an opportunity of growing another crop of timber and getting nothing for it except some cut-over land. I do not see where the Government comes in under a proposition like this when it goes to the expense of growing timber in the national forest and then trades it off for cut-over land without getting anything for it.

Mr. WINGO. The Government comes in where the old cow does that gets milked. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to add, except that I hope that the bill will be promptly passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona moves that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 2349) authorizing the exchange of lands within the Routt National Forest, in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SAN JUAN NATIONAL FOREST, COLO.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands I call up the bill (H. R. 6429) to provide for the consolidation of forest lands within the San Juan National Forest, State of Colorado, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up H. R. 6429, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the San Juan National Forest, within the State of Colorado, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of such Government forest land or timber within any national forest of the State of Colorado as may be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and acceptable to the owner or owners as fair compensation, considering any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, minerals, or easements. Timber given by the Government in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to national forests and under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become part of the San Juan National Forest and subject to all laws and regulations affecting national forests.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the San Juan National Forest, Colo., if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the public interests will be benefited thereby and the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of national forest land within the San Juan National Forest, or the Secretary of Agriculture may authorize the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber within the national forests of the same State. The values in each case shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests and under direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the San Juan National Forest."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I likewise reported this bill from the Committee on the Public Lands for my friend, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]. It is for the same purpose as the bill which has just passed the House. Its terms are identical with that bill. There is no necessity for repeating the reasons for its enactment, and unless some gentleman desires to ask a question we should now vote on the committee amendment.

Mr. WINGO. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. WINGO. Unfortunately I was detained and not present in the Hall of the House until the last part of the consideration of the former bill, so I do not know what reasons were given in support of it. These are private lands that are to be exchanged, are they?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, private lands inside the forest are to be exchanged for timbered lands within the forest, or else the owners of the private lands are to be given timber to be taken off of Government land in the forest?

Mr. HAYDEN. The discretion lies with the Secretary of Agriculture to accept private lands within the exterior limits of the San Juan National Forest in exchange for other lands of equal value or timber of equal value in that forest.

Mr. WINGO. How much land is in that forest?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have not the figures before me. Perhaps the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] can furnish the gentleman from Arkansas with that information, as he has a copy of the hearings at his desk. The gentleman from Arkansas desires to know the area of the private lands in the San Juan National Forest.

Mr. SINNOTT. The total area of this forest is 745,000 acres.

Mr. WINGO. I want to know the area of the private lands.

Mr. SINNOTT. The Government land is 619,683 acres and the private land 125,317 acres.

Mr. WINGO. How many acres is it contemplated to exchange under this bill? They have already been selected, have they not?

Mr. SINNOTT. We have not the figures as to the area desired to be exchanged.

Mr. WINGO. The committee did not get any estimate and were not furnished with the details of the selections made, which it is anticipated will be exchanged under this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; that would have to be done by the Government cruisers.

Mr. WINGO. There has already been a tentative plan laid down, has there not, or mapped out?

Mr. SINNOTT. I presume so. I assume they have had some negotiations, but we have no information as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the San Juan National Forest, within the State of Colorado, which in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of such Government forest land or timber within any national forest of the State of Colorado as may be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and acceptable to the owner or owners as fair compensation, considering any reservations which either the grantor or the Government may make of timber, minerals, or easements. Timber given by the Government in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to national forests and under the direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become part of the San Juan National Forest and subject to all laws and regulations affecting national forests.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands within the San Juan National Forest, Colo., if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the public interests will be benefited thereby and the lands are chiefly valuable for national forest purposes, and in exchange therefor may issue patent for not to exceed an equal value of national forest land within the San Juan National Forest, or the Secretary of Agriculture may authorize the grantor to cut and remove an equal value of timber within the national forests of the same State. The values in each case shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. Timber given in such exchanges shall be cut and removed under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests and under direction and supervision and in accordance with the requirements of the Secretary of Agriculture. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the San Juan National Forest."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6429 and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, for to-day, on account of illness.

To Mr. ALMON, for five days, at the request of Mr. BANKHEAD, on account of important official business.

To Miss ROBERTSON, until Monday next, because of an engagement to speak in Boston on the anniversary of Roosevelt's birthday.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. We ran for a very short time last Calendar Wednesday, and we were deprived of last Unanimous Consent Day. The gentleman from California has a bill which we should call up and which will not take very much time.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has passed a very good grist of bills to-day for Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SINNOTT. We have a Calendar Wednesday only about once a year.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has profited by it to-day. I insist upon my point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, October 27, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

LETTER FROM CORPL. JAMES TANNER—REUNION OF CONFEDERATE VETERANS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, at the request of citizens of my State I called on President Harding recently and urged him to stop at several places in the State on his visit to the South. The Confederate veterans of the South are holding their reunion in Chattanooga this week, and they were anxious to have him address them. While with the President he read a letter he had received from Corpl. James Tanner, formerly commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the letter breathed such a broad and generous spirit that I asked Corpl. Tanner the privilege of having it placed in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

REGISTER OF WILLS,
UNITED STATES COURTHOUSE,
Washington, D. C., October 5, 1921.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I have just returned from attendance upon the national encampment of the Grand Army at Indianapolis, where I answered the roll call for the forty-sixth year without a break.

Our friends and former enemies resident at Chattanooga, handling the forthcoming annual gathering of the surviving members of the Confederacy, wired me very earnestly and at length asking me to secure the passage in our encampment of a resolution requesting you to drop in on their gathering on the 27th instant in your passage through there. They felt that because you had been constrained through press of business to decline the invitation of the Grand Army to meet them at Indianapolis that you might feel that if you dropped in on them, even for an hour or two, it would irritate the Grand Army of the Republic. I consulted with leading men in the Grand Army at Indianapolis, and they seemed to feel that your having been unable to accept our invitation rather barred us from taking the liberty of making a suggestion to you to visit the southern organization of our old-time opponents. Now, Mr. President, I have stood on the border line of peace and good will between the two warring sections, and I am taking the personal liberty of saying two or three things to you: McKinley went South and gave greetings to the old boys in gray, greetings which came from the bottom of his great, generous heart, and it had a mighty good effect. I think it would be a very gracious and politic thing for you to do to stop in Chattanooga, if only for two hours, and give greetings as President of the rejuvenated and reunited Nation to those old boys in gray, who were taught from earliest childhood to believe in the doctrine of State rights, who drank it in with their mothers' milk, and believed in as they believed in their mothers' God, and in support of these principles went out and took a man's chance of life for life. An important thing for you to remember, Mr. President, is that in the two wars that have come to this Nation since Appomattox the sons and grandsons of the men that we fought stood in battle line under the old flag side by side with our sons and grandsons, periling their lives in defense of the flag their fathers fought to put down. It is a great occasion offered you, from my humble standpoint; an occasion too great for you to miss. I am prompted in this connection to say to you that several weeks ago I received a very cordial invitation from the committee at Chattanooga having in charge the arrangements for the Confederate reunion to come down there as their guest. If it were not that I am so disabled and worn as I am, the temptation would be very strong to accept that invitation.

I beg you to give most earnest reconsideration as to whether or not you will stop at Chattanooga. If you were not going down through that country, I would not venture to address this communication to you; but to me it seems a splendid opportunity to make a great point that will inevitably tend to draw the North and South a little closer together.

Cordially, yours, JAMES TANNER.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said bridge or tunnels is commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date of approval hereof.

Resolution on the gold situation to be submitted to the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, by Members of the United States Senate.

Whereas gold is the standard of value and the basis of all credit and its production is vitally important to the financial and commercial life of the Nation and of the world; and

Whereas the production of gold in the United States has declined from $101,035,000 in 1915 to $49,509,000 in 1920, a decline in excess of 50 per cent, due to the fact that the price of gold is fixed by the Government while the cost of producing gold has greatly increased; and

Whereas the consumption of gold in manufactures and the arts increased from $37,820,000 in 1915 to $75,490,000 in 1919, an increase of 100 per cent, due to the excessive demand for luxuries and the fact that the Government has been supplying the industrial consumers of gold with the metal at the prewar price; and

Whereas the normal process of deflation will not be sufficiently rapid to prevent the further decline in the production of gold and the wastage of developed gold are resources due to the flooding of the mines; and

Whereas the gold standard can not be permanently maintained without gold production, and the Nation is confronted to-day by the prospect of a heavy drain upon the monetary gold reserve, which will necessitate a still further curtailment of credit; and

Whereas Representative LOUIS T. MCFADDEN, chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, has introduced a bill, H. R. 5025, in the Sixty-seventh Congress which provides for the maintenance of the normal gold production of the United States by an equitable adjustment between the producer and the industrial consumer of gold; and

Whereas H. R. 5025, containing a provision to levy an excise, in accordance with the Constitution, has been introduced in the House of Representatives and referred to the Ways and Means Committee thereof; and

Whereas H. R. 5025, involving both the policy and administration of the Treasury Department, has been referred by Chairman FORDNEY to the Secretary of the Treasury for an opinion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the undersigned, Members of the United States Senate, urge upon the Secretary of the Treasury the significance of his reply to Chairman FORDNEY in determining the status of the gold-mining industry, which is vitally important to the maintenance of the gold standard and the financial security of the Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That if upon the analysis of the Secretary of the Treasury reasons can not be definitely assigned for opposing the provisions of H. R. 5025 the Secretary is requested to indorse the same, in order to expedite the action of the House and permit the bill to be considered by the Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That if the Secretary of the Treasury has specific reasons for opposing the provisions of H. R. 5025 he is hereby urgently requested to formulate a proposal for enactment by Congress, first, to protect the gold-mining industry from destruction, which is a serious matter, irrespective of the fact that its operation is necessary as the basis of our monetary system; and, second, in anticipation of the heavy foreign drain upon our gold reserve, to provide for augmenting said reserve from sources of domestic production, and thereby lessen the need for the further and extensive curtailment of credit which otherwise would result.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, September 30, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of August 17, 1921, presented on behalf of Senators from the Western States, and have been glad to give careful consideration to the inclosed resolution of the Senators with respect to the gold-mining industry and the bill which has been introduced in the House of Representatives (H. R. 5025) "To provide for the protection of the monetary gold reserve by the maintenance of the normal gold production of the United States by imposing an excise, for revenue and other purposes, upon all gold used for other than monetary purposes, and by the payment of a premium to the producers of newly mined gold, and providing penalties for the violation thereof."

The Treasury's position with respect to this bill has already been stated in my letter of May 9, 1921, to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, a copy of which is inclosed for your information. The developments which have occurred since this letter was written have confirmed the Treasury's views and have shown that as commodity prices return toward normal and costs become stabilized on a lower level relief should gradually come in the ordinary course of events from the difficulties of which the gold-mining industry has been complaining. Already there are signs of some improvement.

The bill presents two main questions, the first of which is of chief concern to the Treasury, namely, whether it is necessary or advisable to pay the proposed premium of about 50 per cent on newly mined gold and impose a tax on gold used in the arts in order to protect the monetary gold reserve of the United States. I think it is clear that there is no need for the legislation from this point of view. The market for gold is international, and in the present state of the exchanges the United States draws gold from every quarter and receives practically the whole gold production of the world, with the exception of what goes to the arts. The effect has been an unprecedented gold movement to this country during the past year or more, which has resulted in net imports many times greater than this country's normal annual production of gold. During the calendar year 1920, according to the reports of the Federal Reserve Board, the net imports of gold into the United States in excess of exports aggregated about $95,000,000. In the present calendar year, down to September 20, 1921, the imports have amounted to over $545,000,000 as against total exports of about $13,500,000, or an excess of imports over exports amounting to about $532,000,000. The figures are not available, of course, as to domestic gold production in 1921, but for 1920 the Director of the Mint reports that the total is estimated at $51,048,526. The figures for earlier years, with figures as to the amounts of gold used in the arts, are given in the Annual Report of the Director of the Mint for 1920 on pages 72–5. A copy of this report is inclosed for your information. The amounts of gold used in the arts, it appears from this report, include substantial amounts of old material which do not drain the monetary gold supply. I inclose also a copy of the report issued by the Bureau of the Census under date of September 24, 1921, with respect to the condition of the gold-mining industry in the year 1919.

The result of the operations of the past few years has been to accumulate in the United States the largest monetary gold reserve in its history, and the largest stock of monetary gold in the world. The total amount of monetary gold in the country on September 1, 1921, according to the inclosed monthly circulation statement of that date, is $3,377,417,980, of which $2,641,061,000 was held on August 31, 1921, in the reserves of the Federal reserve system. Since that date the reserves have been augmented by additional imports, and on September 28 were $2,725,966,000. Imports of gold are continuing at a heavy rate, and there are as yet no indications that the movement is at an end. For your information in this connection I am inclosing copies of the statements issued by the Federal Reserve Board showing the condition of the Federal reserve banks as at the close of business on August 31 and September 28, 1921. I inclose also a copy of the Federal Reserve Board statement of September 30, 1921, which shows the imports and exports of gold from January 1 to September 20, 1921, and their distribution by countries.

These figures show that there is no shortage of gold in the United States, and that there is nothing in the position of the gold reserves which makes it either necessary or advisable to encourage by subsidies or other artificial means new mine production of gold. As a matter of fact, the monetary gold supply of this country, instead of decreasing, has greatly increased in recent years, and is more than ample to meet the credit and currency needs of the country. The monetary stock of gold of the world has also increased during the past 10 years, it has been estimated, by as much as $2,000,000,000.

The other question raised by the bill is one of legislative policy, on which the Treasury is not called upon to express an opinion, namely, whether a subsidy or bonus should be paid to domestic producers of gold because of the hardships which the gold-mining industry has suffered during the period of abnormal war costs. As already indicated, I believe that these conditions will gradually right themselves without a Government subsidy, and that the difficulties in which the producers of gold have found themselves in the meantime are due chiefly to the fact that gold is the standard of value. It is true, of course, that the price of gold, as the monetary unit, is fixed by law, but this in turn gives compensating advantages to gold producers in other times, when production costs are low, because of the assured market at a fixed price which is always available. It is difficult in these circumstances to see what special equity there is in the claim for a premium when costs are high. There would certainly be no suggestion of a discount if costs were low.

The tax which the bill would impose upon the use of gold for nonmonetary purposes, while in form a tax, would in fact put restrictions upon the free convertibility of the currency into gold. If gold could not be used, except under heavy penalties, for anything else than money, its value would be impaired and there would be, in effect, a clog on the convertibility of the currency. One dollar in paper currency, in other words, would not buy one dollar's worth of gold, if the gold was to be used in the arts. Gold in large quantities, moreover, is imported from abroad and even under legislation like that proposed could be purchased in foreign countries in the open market. To put a penalty on foreign gold thus brought into this country for nonmonetary purposes, in order to pay a premium to domestic producers, would seem to have little or no relation to the protection of our own monetary gold reserves.

I find upon investigation that in the previous administration there was appointed a committee to consider the condition of the gold-mining industry, and that its findings were published in February, 1919, and approved by my predecessors as Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me that the report of this committee is interesting in the present situation, and I am therefore inclosing a copy for your information.

I have noted particularly the request made in the resolution which was presented with your letter that if the Treasury be opposed to H. R. 5025 it formulate a proposal for enactment by Congress to relieve the gold-mining industry and protect the gold reserve. As already indicated, I believe that no legislation of this character is needed in order to protect the gold reserve, and therefore have no proposal to suggest for this purpose. On the question of possible legislation to provide a bonus for the mining of gold, the Treasury also has no proposal to submit, believing, as indicated herein, that if such a bonus were to be granted it would come as an exercise of legislative discretion by Congress.

Very truly, yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

OCTOBER 19, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This will acknowledge receipt of your reply of September 30 to my letter of August 17, transmitting the resolution upon the gold situation signed by the Senators from the Western States.

I have given careful consideration to the gold policy which you have enunciated, which, so far as I can see, is identical with that of the last administration. For this reason I deem it my duty to invite your attention to the serious manner in which that policy has affected our domestic industrial condition, our export trade, and the maintenance of the gold standard.

The report of the committee appointed in the previous administration to consider the condition of the gold-mining industry, approved by your predecessors as Secretary of the Treasury, to which you refer, expressed the opinion that a decline in commodity prices was going to be the natural solution of the problem, but those prices continued for two years after that to ascend to such heights that the mines were forced to shut down, showing that the prophecy of the committee was in error.

This report is interesting, but because of my practical knowledge of and familiarity with the conditions which prevail in the gold-mining industry I can not agree with the committee's conclusions.

You have expressed the opinion in your letter of May 9 to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and in your letter of September 30 to me that as commodity prices return toward normal and costs become stabilized on a lower level relief should gradually come in the ordinary course of events from the difficulties of which the gold-mining industry has been complaining. The wholesale index number of the Bureau of Labor Statistics has been recently ascending over the low point established in June, and still remains over 50 per cent above the wholesale price level of 1913. This would show that the general price level is rising instead of declining. It must be apparent that as the price level increases the economic pressure upon the gold-mining industry will correspondingly increase.

The retail-price level, upon which the purchase of mining materials would be more accurately based, has not yet descended proportionately to the level of wholesale prices. No change in the price level has yet taken place which would enable the profitable operation of those gold mines which had discontinued operations during this period of economic stress. In fact, the normal condition of the industry can not be restored unless the purchasing power of the 1913 dollar is restored. I fully appreciate that over a period of many years there may be a remote possibility that the purchasing power of the 1913 dollar will have returned, but I can not conceive the possibility that the purchasing power of the dollar, in terms of material and labor utilized in the gold-mining industry, will return in time to save the ore reserves from loss through caving in the mines which have been shut down and filled with water during the period 1916–1921.

It must also be apparent that we can not hope to maintain normal production of gold in the United States, which for the decade prior to 1916 annually averaged $95,000,000, unless the purchasing power of the 1913 dollar is reestablished. The object, therefore, in suggesting that the loss in the purchasing power of the gold ounce be temporarily compensated is to conserve the investment which has been made in the gold-mining industry prior to 1916 from wastage and loss, and thus to conserve the gold-producing power of the Nation. The improvement which you indicate has already taken place can not refer to increased activities in any but those few properties which have under very great difficulties and expense to their ore reserves maintained operations over this critical period.

The United States Geological Survey, in the "Mineral Resources of the United States for 1920," makes the following comment with reference to the condition of the gold-mining industry:

"Gold mining continued in a greatly depressed condition, and the value of the country's output decreased to less than $50,000,000. Less than half of the gold mines of the country were active and some of the large mines were closed permanently."

Based upon reports of gold production for the first six months of 1921, a total production for this year will probably not exceed $40,000,000, a decrease of 20 per cent from that of 1920. The President's conference on unemployment, through its committee on emergency measures and mining, recommended, on October 13, 1921, as follows:

"Gold mining suffers from the excessive cost of supplies and other items, and the value of the gold output being fixed as against material advances in cost has operated to restrict the employment of labor in gold mines."

These are not signs of improvement but rather of further depression in the gold-mining industry.

You state that "the monetary gold stock of the world has also increased during the past 10 years, it has been estimated, by as much as $2,000,000,000."

With the enormous increase in the paper currency of the world, the marked decline in gold production, and the increased gold consumption in the industrial arts the ratio of gold to notes has declined from 66 per cent in 1914 to less than 10 per cent in 1920. The paper currency of the world is now eleven times as much as at the beginning of the war, and the available supply of gold from sources of new production bears an increasingly diminishing ratio to the note circulation. The gold holdings and paper currencies of the 50 principal countries for which figures are available show that the ratio of gold to notes was 66.8 per cent in 1914, 17.9 per cent in 1918, 13.7 per cent in 1919, and 9.3 per cent in 1920. During this same period, in addition to these extensive note issues, world national debts expanded from $43,000,000,000 at the beginning of the war to $212,000,000,000 at its close, and advanced to about $256,000,000,000 at the end of the first year of peace, and at the end of the second year were approximately $300,000,000,000. The annual interest charges have advanced from $1,750,000,000 in 1913 to $12,000,000,000 in 1920. Both the principal of this debt and interest are payable in gold.

It would appear from these facts that the increase of $2,000,000,000 in the world's gold stock which you have cited is a very meager addition as compared with the existing obligations arising from the need for currency redemption and the payments of debts and interest. The experience gained since the termination of the war indicates that at the earliest opportunity the people of every country will desire to return to their prewar monetary customs. Those who have sustained losses through the purchase of paper notes which have since depreciated in value are aware that the use of this paper as an economy in the use of gold is a great fallacy. The preference which had developed for the use of paper notes will be replaced by a demand for the actual circulation of gold. The very fact that the banks are expected to discourage the use of gold as currency would seem to be evidence that they are by no means confident that the people will not demand gold in circulation whenever the reserves are released. The world stands bankrupt to-day for lack of gold.

The net importation of gold into this country from 1914 to September 20, 1921, has been $1,300,000,000. To this extraordinary extent we have depleted the monetary gold stocks of the countries of the world, which has been one of the fundamental causes for depreciation of foreign currencies. For the period January 1 to September 20, 1921, the net importation of gold amounted to $531,700,000, of which the net importation from Europe amounted to $401,800,000, or about 76 per cent. France, with its greatly depreciated currency, contributed $151,600,000 of this gold, while Sweden contributed $55,000,000 and England $154,000,000. To the depreciation in the European currencies in particular may be attributed the marked decline in our export trade. The present industrial depression in this country is largely due to the falling off in our export trade. The external purchasing power of all foreign countries of the world must be increased in order to restore a normal condition in our export trade. A redistribution of the gold which we have acquired since the beginning of the war is a prerequisite to increasing the external purchasing power of European countries and restoring financial poise to the balance of the world. Europe's need for part of our excessive supply of gold should not be forced to wait upon her ultimate recovery, if we are to consider the dependence of our own Nation's prosperity upon the restoration of export trade. As rapidly as one country after another approaches a more stable condition in its currency, an increased demand for gold will occur.

Such a condition compels us to adopt a gold policy that will make possible a redistribution of the gold which we have acquired during and since the war as soon as conditions permit. Under such a policy we should not permit that gold to become the basis of our credit and currency structure, as it could not then be released for export without forcing a rapid deflation. The United States should occupy the position of trustee for this newly acquired gold.

The total reserves of the Federal reserve banks on August 31, 1921, amounted to $2,790,000,000. If these reserves were to be reduced by the $1,330,000,000 of gold acquired during the war and post-war period, the gold cover of the Federal reserve notes in circulation on that date would be 34.8 per cent, which is considerably below the minimum of 40 per cent provided in the Federal reserve act and considerably less than half the gold cover reported of 88.5 per cent. This statement indicates that some of this newly acquired gold is already a part of our credit and currency structure and could not be released without a still further contraction in the volume of our credit and currency. That does not indicate that under such a gold policy we have an excessive amount of gold to accomplish the work which it will be called upon to perform both nationally and internationally.

There is a still more important consideration in a gold policy to redistribute this newly acquired gold than that which relates to the revival of our export trade. There is no question that the unstable condition of the foreign exchanges and their depreciation seriously menaces the maintenance of the gold standard. If the influx of gold continues at the present rate—and you state there are no indications that the influx may end—it will not be long before the United States holds the gold stock of the world. It must be apparent that if foreign exchanges continue to depreciate, with a continued loss of this gold to us, the increased disparities from the gold standard par would still more seriously jeopardize the security of gold as the international monetary unit and the medium of exchange. It would not seem possible for one nation to maintain a monetary unit as a medium of exchange when that unit could not be utilized in the trade transactions of the balance of the world.

This gold was purchased by us with very cheap dollars, and it will have to be repurchased by these foreign countries with much more expensive dollars in terms of labor, and there will naturally arise a great resistance to a monetary system which thus imposes such a great burden upon the peoples of so many countries. Our problem, therefore, is to assist those nations in every way possible to recover their former gold stocks and thus enable them to appreciate their currencies to the gold standard level. If we fail to render this assistance, some other unit will be adopted as a matter not only of convenience but of necessity. As a creditor Nation we have become still more involved in the world's financial structure, and our continued position as such is dependent upon the maintenance of the gold standard.

From the report of the Director of the Mint, which you have submitted, the "new gold" which was sold by the Treasury Department through the mint service to the industrial consumers, principally for the manufacture of jewelry, amounted for the years 1914–1919, inclusive, to $232,000,000. The National City Co. estimates that the amount of "new gold" sold by the mint service for consumption in the arts in 1920 amounted to $60,000,000. This makes a grand total of $292,000,000 of "new gold" which was diverted from the monetary reserve for the manufacture of gold articles largely to satisfy the demand for luxuries. This statement excludes the "old material," in accordance with the differentiation made in your letter, which reduces considerably the total amount of gold consumed in the manufactures and the arts.

It is interesting to note that during the calendar year 1919 the United States exported an excess of gold over its imports in the amount of $291,600,000. Had this "new gold" not been withdrawn from the monetary reserve for industrial consumption it would have been sufficient to more than replace the amount of gold lost by excess exportation in 1919, and would have removed, to a large extent, the need for putting into effect the drastic measures of deflation which were adopted by the Federal Reserve Board as a last resort to preserve the gold reserve ratio from declining below the legal minimum prescribed in the Federal reserve act. Had this gold been conserved for monetary uses instead of dissipated in satisfying the demands for luxury the industries of the country would not have become paralyzed by a deflation so rapid and extensive as the one which was imposed.

In the testimony of Gov. Benjamin Strong, of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, before the Joint Agricultural Commission of the Senate and House of Representatives, he stated that $100,000 in gold in the bank reserves of the Federal reserve system was equivalent to about $1,800,000 in terms of credit in the country banks of the Nation. The $292,000,000 of "new gold" which was withdrawn from the monetary reserve for industrial consumption during and since the war would have been equivalent to an extension of credit to the country banks of $5,250,000,000. Had this gold been available in September, 1920, a less restricted policy of deflation could have been adopted with safety which would not have imposed the burden that the agricultural and other industries of our Nation have been forced to bear.

I am firmly convinced that if our gold reserve had been protected against this extraordinarily heavy industrial drain, and a moderate deflation begun within a year after the armistice, our present difficulties of depression would not only have been minimized but might never have occurred.

The decline in our governmental revenue receipts is due largely to the falling off in export trade; and yet the gold policy enunciated in your letter and which has been in effect both during and since the war has intensified the difficulties with which the Treasury Department is now confronted.

Had it not been for the loss in our decreased gold production over this period, which has been minimized by the jewelers in their testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, in their desire to guard their interests from the payment of this infinitesimal tax, an additional credit of $2,000,000,000 could have been available to our country banks, making a total credit which might have been extended by a more conservative gold policy of $7,250,000,000. This amount of credit was extinguished through the wasteful practices of our war and post-war periods. The consequences of this policy have not yet ceased to exist.

Congress, realizing the importance of immediate action in controlling the sales of gold to the trades, whenever the protection of our monetary system demands, enacted the law of March 3, 1901, which not only delegates to the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to control these sales, but makes it mandatory that sales shall not be made without his consent.

In your communication you refer to the fact that the market for gold is international. There could, therefore, have been no embarrassment to the industrial consumers of gold if they had been forced to purchase their gold in the world's markets instead of having been allowed to remove it directly from the monetary reserve which serves as the basis of our credit and currency.

It is important to note that when the gold reserve ratio of the Federal reserve system was lowest, interest rates became high and progressed to still higher levels when the policy of the Federal reserve system to arbitrarily restrict the further extension of credit was put into effect. As soon, however, as the stimulating effect of the additions of newly imported gold to the reserves of the system took place, interest rates became more moderate and the credit tension was considerably lessened, showing what a far-reaching influence under the present banking system of the Nation a small amount of gold exerts over the vital instrument of credit.

The benefits of this newly imported gold were immediately reflected in our domestic financial system, but this was accomplished at the expense of curtailing our export trade by reducing the purchasing power of Europe. The same benefits from a like amount of domestically produced gold in the banking system would have resulted without causing this decline in our export trade. The gold which has been diverted from the gold reserve to the manufacture of luxuries, had it been retained in the banking system, would have had a similarly beneficial effect without depressing our export trade.

I note your statement that—

"It is difficult in these circumstances to see what special equity there is in your claim for a premium when costs are high."

The equity lies in the fact that in the case of the gold-mining industry the die was cast, the investment was made, and the loss of this investment occasioned by the shutting down of the mines was forced upon the industry because of a lack of governmental foresight in promptly providing a means for compensating the loss in purchasing power of the gold ounce, in accordance with the index number; whereas the investment in the jewelry industry would not have been impaired in the least by the payment of the excise imposed upon the manufacture of gold articles which could have been readily passed on to the consumer, as provided for in the legislation upon which your opinion has been asked.

The enactment of this proposed legislation will protect the public by insuring the quality of the article sold and will enable the public also to appraise the cost of the workmanship as well as the cost of the raw material. The provisions of the McFadden bill which were referred to in the resolution impose no penalty on the purchase of foreign gold in this market to be used for nonmonetary purposes, as the industrial consumers would continue to purchase their gold from the United States Mint at the free gold market price. For this reason a speculative market for gold could not develop.

Furthermore, the cost of the premium provided in this legislation would not have fallen on the general public as a tax burden, but would have been borne directly by the consumers of luxuries who have, it is presumed, the ability to pay.

On the other hand, the Government sold during this entire period of high prices $252,000,000 of "new gold" to the industrial consumers at the prewar price. In effect, is this not subsidizing the jewelers and other industrial consumers?

The objection to employing artificial means to compensate for the lost purchasing power of the gold producer's dollar is answered by recalling that any price fixed by the Government is artificial in character.

I note particularly the paragraph in your letter which begins:

"The tax which the bill would impose upon the use of gold for nonmonetary purposes, while in form a tax, would, in fact, put restrictions upon the free convertibility of the currency into gold. If gold could not be used except under heavy penalties for anything else than money, its value would be impaired and there would be, in effect, a clog on the convertibility of the currency. One dollar in paper currency, in other words, would not buy one dollar's worth of gold, if the gold was to be used in the arts."

It is difficult for me to understand how such a conclusion could be drawn when the provisions of the bill expressly state that the tax proposed is to be collected only at the time of the sale of the finished product. This tax is, therefore, not imposed upon the bullion to be sold by the mint to the industrial consumers of gold. Under the provisions of this bill the industrial consumers continue to obtain gold from the mint at the monetary price which now prevails. There is no relation now between the sale price of a manufactured article containing gold to the cost of the raw material contained therein. Why, therefore, should the addition of this tax, which would be a small fraction of the sale price of the gold article, affect the free flow of gold or its convertibility? In France, since 1873, a special excise has been imposed upon the sale of manufactured articles containing gold. No disturbance to the free flow of gold or to the French monetary system has ever resulted. This tax in June, 1920, was greatly increased. No difficulty has been experienced in France in collecting this tax, and there should be no difficulty in collecting the tax here, as it can be readily measured by the amount of gold contained.

Normally $250,000,000 of the world's total gold production were annually available for monetary purposes, but during 1919–20 there was less than $60,000,000 per annum available for monetary purposes, the balance having been absorbed by the industrial arts—India and China.

The production of gold throughout the world is declining, and unrestricted industrial consumption for years to come would be so large as to reduce the amount available for monetary purposes. This condition must be remedied if the gold standard is to survive this period of readjustment. The industrial gold consumption of the world should, therefore, be forcibly curtailed and gold production stimulated. Both of these conditions should be satisfied by an equitable adjustment in the cost and price equation between the producer of new gold and the industrial consumer. The McFadden bill provides for such an adjustment.

This constructive gold policy put into effect at this time will safeguard the maintenance of the gold standard. Such a policy is also prerequisite to a more rapid revival of our domestic industry and export trade upon which the full-time employment of our people and the prosperity of the Nation depend.

In view of the great importance of this subject at the present time and because of its vital, far-reaching effects upon all the activities of our national life, I shall await with much interest your answer to this letter.

Very truly, yours, TASKER L. ODDIE.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE GROUND AT PLAINFIELD, N. J.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2425) granting permission to the city of Plainfield, N. J., to widen Watchung Avenue in front of the Federal post-office building, and for other purposes. It grants permission to the city of Plainfield, N. J., to widen an avenue and grants a quitclaim deed for land now belonging to the United States. It is necessary to improve the street.

The bill has the approval of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury. The fact that the deed has not been heretofore granted is holding up the improvement of the city and creating a great deal of confusion. There are certain amendments of the committee which are simply corrective of the phraseology of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 7, after the word "to," to insert "all or any lesser part of"; in line 8, after the words "west side," to insert "and along the Watchung Avenue frontage"; in line 10, before the word "shall," to strike out "it" and insert "such strip"; in line 11, after the word "width," to strike out the comma and the words "and extending along the Watchung Avenue frontage of said property"; in line 12, after the word "and," to strike out the word "that"; on page 2, line 2, before the word "said," to strike out the words "so forth" and to insert "do such other work upon"; in line 8, after the words "costs of," to strike out "such remodeling, and so forth, of said Federal building, and so forth," and to insert "all of said work upon said Federal building, grounds, and approaches"; in line 12, before the word "described," to insert the word "said"; in line 13, after the word "hereinbefore," to strike out "described" and insert "provided"; and in line 14, before the word "said," to strike out the word "that," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to convey, by quitclaim deed, to the city of Plainfield, N. J., for street purposes, and for no other purpose, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all or any lesser part of a strip of land off the west side and along the Watchung Avenue frontage of the Federal building site in said city, 10 feet in width except opposite the entrance steps of the Federal building, where such strip shall be approximately 3 feet 9 inches in width; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to remodel, alter, and repair, and do such other work upon said Federal building, grounds, and approaches as may be necessary, in his opinion, for the accommodation and convenience of the business of the United States on account of the widening of said Watchung Avenue: Provided, however, That the said city of Plainfield, as a consideration for such conveyance, shall bear the costs of all of said work upon said Federal building, grounds, and approaches, as ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That the said city of Plainfield shall not have the right to sell or convey the said described premises nor to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore provided; and in the event said premises shall not be used for street purposes only and cared for and maintained as are other public streets in said city the right, title, and interest hereby authorized to be conveyed shall revert to the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the bill seems to grant public lands of the Federal Government to a city in the Senator's State. Does he not think it proper that a brief explanation should be made of the measure?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I explained the bill when I asked unanimous consent for its consideration. A strip of land of 10 feet belonging to the Government in front of the post office in Plainfield is needed for the widening of the street. This bill proposes to grant a quitclaim deed for the land to the city, which agrees to pay all of the expense of the improvement. The matter has been submitted to the Post Office Department, and the department have approved it. It will make the street more accessible and will be an improvement which will benefit the post office as well as the city.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Secretary of the Treasury recommend the passage of the bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. He is the custodian of such buildings.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from New Jersey how much Government ground will be left in front of the post-office building.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The same amount as on the remainder of the street. I think the sidewalk is 12 feet wide, or about that; I do not know its exact width, but the proposition will carry out the general improvement of the street.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of order of business 276. It is a local bill of great importance to the section of country to which it relates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is still before the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Excuse me. I thought that action had been taken on that bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the matter for which the Senator from Washington asks consideration lead to much debate, I should like to inquire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If it leads to any discussion, I will withdraw my request for the consideration of the bill. It is purely a local bill.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN addressed the Chair.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, we are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I beg pardon. I have the floor for the consideration of a bill.

Mr. PENROSE. But the bill is open to objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand it is open to objection, but I also understand that the Chair is about to put the question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, Mr. President, we are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly, but I have asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill, and consent was granted.

Mr. SIMMONS. One unanimous-consent agreement can not be set aside by another.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina object to the consideration of the bill of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to object to this particular bill, but I give notice that I shall object to the consideration of any other bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I fully recognize that an existing unanimous-consent agreement can not be modified, and these proceedings are irregular. I dislike to inconvenience Senators, but one bill is hardly passed before consideration for another is asked, and all such measures are irregularly brought before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, we are supposed to consider to-day, I think principally an amendment which I have offered to the corporation-tax provisions of the pending bill. I ask that the amendment submitted by me may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] offers the following amendment:

On page 79, line 1, after the word "tax," strike out all down to and including line 7, and insert "equal to the sum of the following: Eight per cent of the first 10 per cent of the amount of the net income; 16 per cent of the next 10 per cent of the amount of the net income; 24 per cent of the next 10 per cent of the amount of the net income; 32 per cent of the next 10 per cent of the amount of the net income; 40 per cent of the next 10 per cent of the amount of the net income; 48 per cent of the next 10 per cent of the amount of the net income; and 56 per cent of the remainder of the net income.

"In no case shall the amount of the net income taxed by this section exceed the portion thereof which has not been distributed, before the time the return for such taxable year is due, as dividends to shareholders or members."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this amendment is in the language of the drafting committee, and it means precisely what I intend it shall mean. I can state, however, if Senators will give me their attention, the purpose of the amendment in a manner which can be more easily understood.

As the bill now stands the excess-profits tax upon corporations has been repealed. It is proposed now by the committee amendment, but which the amendment I have presented if adopted will supplant, to levy a flat-rate tax of 15 per cent on all earnings of corporations. The purpose of my amendment is to eliminate the entire flat-rate tax upon corporate income and to substitute therefor a graduated tax only upon the net income of corporations which is not distributed in dividends. It is a flexible plan, one which is adapted to peace-time conditions, one which can be varied to raise the requisite amount of revenue, and it will provide a method for the equalization of taxation.

If this amendment be adopted there will be other amendments which I deem advisable. One of those amendments should provide that on dividends distributed by corporations the individual will pay his normal tax, just as though the income had been received from a source other than a corporation; and inasmuch as this provision for a tax upon undistributed earnings of corporations is supposed to be at such a graduated rate as to conform as reasonably as may be to the surtaxes and the normal tax levied upon incomes derived from any source, an amendment ought to be adopted, in my judgment—although it is not an essential part of the program—to the effect that when the net incomes on which the tax on the undistributed earnings has been paid are themselves distributed they shall then be free from further tax to the individual who may receive them.

Another amendment which I think would be advisable and which I consider important in connection with this plan should provide that when corporations issue interest-bearing scrip dividends, such dividends in the hands of the individual stockholder shall be taxed precisely as other income.

Another amendment which I think is advisable, even under the present bill and without reference to the proposed amendment now pending, is that there should be an option given to partnerships and to corporations to choose the method of making their returns for taxation purposes, permitting a partnership to make a return as a corporation and permitting a corporation to make a return as a partnership. It will at once be apparent that the purpose of such an amendment is to produce exact equality, so far as it may be, among the various taxpayers of the country.

With respect to the first amendment the present situation is a difficult one for the Congress to deal with at this time. The burdens of the Government are now necessarily high by reason of the war which has been fought, but which has left in its wake many unusual burdens. It is also difficult because of the fact that at this particular time the business conditions of the country are greatly depressed. I believe that it is the general opinion that business is at a lower ebb now than it will be at any time in the future, or, at least, in the near future; but at this time of depressed business we are called upon to raise an extraordinary amount of revenue with which to pay the expenses of the Government. Federal taxation at this time will be an extremely severe burden upon the people of this country, more so, perhaps, than at any other time, and that makes it imperatively necessary that this burden shall be scientifically placed upon the people of this country.

There are two fundamental principles which I believe, and which I am satisfied all Senators believe, should underlie the preparation of any bill of this character. Those two fundamental principles are, in the first place, that any tax imposed shall be a just tax, and, in the second place, it shall be levied so that it may be borne equally; in other words, the two principles of justice and equity should pervade the levying of a revenue tax, especially at this time.

A tax is just, in my opinion—and I hope that Senators will at least get the thought which I intend to express—if it is placed upon those who are best able to bear it.

That principle is applied, I think, in a very wholesome way in the tax which we propose to levy upon the incomes of individuals. It is a graduated tax, based upon the great principle that those who receive more can afford to pay a higher rate than those who receive less. That is the basic principle of the surtaxes upon individual incomes; and a tax which is levied upon that principle is a just tax.

The next principle is that that tax should be levied equally upon those who are enjoying an equal degree of prosperity.

That means that everybody who has a net income of $10,000 ought to be taxed the same amount. Every individual who has an income of $100,000 a year ought to be taxed precisely the same amount. In other words, there should be equality, equity, in taxation.

In all earnestness I make the statement that at least in my humble opinion the program now proposed by the committee violates both of these fundamental principles, and I hope to demonstrate that before I have concluded my remarks.

It doubtless will be of benefit to recall the history of what I am about to propose and of the legislation which has passed the Congress since we have had the right to levy a tax upon incomes. It will not be necessary, however, to go back further than the situation which presented itself to the Congress in the summer of 1917. After we entered the war we realized that it was necessary to raise a very large amount of revenue with which to pay the expenses of the Government, and at that time we provided a law which levied taxes in various ways.

There was a normal tax placed upon individuals, partnerships, and corporations; there was a surtax placed upon the incomes of individuals and partnerships; there was a tax upon stock dividends which might be issued by corporations; and there was an excess-profits tax which was levied upon the business of individuals, partnerships, and corporations.

Senators will observe the disparity which entered into that law. Individuals and partners engaged in business were taxed upon all of their income whether it remained in the business or not. If it was represented by additional goods upon the shelf, additional wheat in the bin, or additional farm implements, it was considered as income and subjected to all the income taxes placed upon individuals. There was placed upon corporations a normal tax and the same excess-profits tax that was put upon individuals, but no surtax was provided. It was recognized that there was a very large percentage of the net income of corporations which was not subject to the equalizing surtaxes which individuals and partnerships paid; so I proposed at that time that in addition to these other taxes there should be levied upon the undistributed earnings of corporations some sort of a surtax which should to some extent equalize the surtaxes which were placed upon individuals and partners engaged in business.

At that time the Finance Committee of the Senate adopted the suggestion in a modified form, and when the bill was first reported to the Senate there was a recommendation that there be placed upon these undistributed earnings a tax which should in some measure equalize the surtaxes which were paid by individuals upon their incomes which were still represented by commodities in their business. Later on that bill was recommitted, and the committee proposed certain substitutes for it. It proposed that there be levied an additional normal tax of 2 per cent upon incomes of corporations, and it was thought that the tax upon stock dividends would in a measure meet the other requirements of the situation.

It finally developed that that produced an inequitable result. It was realized at that time that if you were to put a tax upon stock dividends there would be no stock dividends of any consequence, and that proved to be the case; and later on the Supreme Court repealed by its decision the levying of a tax upon stock dividends. Regardless of the merits of that decision, it was done. So far as I am individually concerned, in my belief the decision was right under the law, and I so insisted at the time we were considering the question of a tax upon stock dividends.

That left the situation with a normal tax upon individuals, partnerships, and corporations. It left the excess-profits tax upon all those varieties of business. It left a surtax upon individual incomes, but no further or additional tax upon corporate earnings except the 2 per cent. In 1918, when we came to revise the law for the purpose of raising more revenue, the inequities of that old law became so apparent that the Congress repealed the excess-profits tax as to individuals and partners, the excess-profits tax upon corporate earnings being designed to take the place in a degree of the surtaxes upon individuals and partners.

I do not believe that that met the situation; but now it is proposed by the committee to repeal the excess-profits tax upon corporations and to substitute in lieu thereof a flat tax upon all the earnings of the corporation. I submit that the excess-profits tax which the Senate has just voted to repeal has many things in opposition to it. There are many reasons why that tax should be repealed. I need not recount them now; but, at any rate, that excess-profits tax was based upon one of the fundamental principles which should underlie this legislation. It was based upon that principle which says that the taxes should be paid by those best able to pay. It at least conformed to that principle. In my judgment it violated the other principle that there should be equality in taxation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. KING. If the Senator is pursuing a line of argument I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that I am, and unless there is some point that is urgent I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. KING. Then I will defer what I was about to ask.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I want to demonstrate to the Senators how the committee proposes to violate the principle to which I have just referred by the repeal of the excess-profits tax. This subject has been under discussion for several years, and has received the attention of the economists of the country, and we can now analyze to a very close degree the effect of what it is proposed to do now.

Here is a chart which was prepared by Mr. Howard Clinton Beck, of this city. He is a certified public accountant. He has prepared a chart showing the effect of the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the substitution therefor of an additional flat tax up to the rate of 15 per cent on corporations. This chart is a most illuminating document. It puts in tabulated form a selected list of corporations with definite invested capital, ranging from $5,000 up to $10,000,000—a corporation with an invested capital of $5,000, one of $10,000, $15,000, $20,000, $25,000, and on up, as I say, to $10,000,000.

He has figured the operation of this law as it is now proposed upon these variously capitalized corporations earning different rates of income upon their invested capital, earning 5 per cent, earning 6 per cent, earning 8 per cent, earning 10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 33⅓ per cent, 50 per cent. It appears from this chart that all of the corporations earning less than 15 per cent upon their invested capital will have their taxes increased, and he gives the amount of the increase that must be paid by every one of those corporations earning less than 15 per cent upon their capital. He shows that all of these corporations except those with not much more than nominal capital, earning 15 per cent or more upon their invested capital, will have their taxes decreased, and the amounts are given in the various brackets, the various percentages of net income, based upon their invested capital, and a large number of corporations of different amounts of invested capital.

I do not believe that the Congress wants to stand for that proposition, that it wants to violate a very fundamental principle of taxation, that taxes should be based upon ability to pay; but that is precisely what this program means. It means the relieving of high earnings of taxes and their imposition upon those who are earning less amounts.

I would like to read a few of these results. We will take a corporation, for instance, which has an invested capital of $150,000. If it is earning only 5 per cent upon its invested capital, under the present law it would pay a tax of only $550. Under the proposed law, this repeal of the excess-profits tax and this flat tax of 15 per cent, that corporation with that modest earning of 5 per cent would have its taxes increased from $550 to $1,125.

If that same corporation earned 6 per cent upon its invested capital it would have its taxes increased under this proposed plan from $700, under the proposed law, to $1,350.

If it is earning 8 per cent upon its capital, under the present law it would pay $1,000, but under the proposed plan it would pay $1,800.

If it is earning 10 per cent upon its invested capital, under the present law it would pay $1,300, and under this plan now advocated by the committee it would pay $2,250.

If it earns 15 per cent upon its invested capital, under the present law it would pay $3,400, under the proposed law it would pay less than that amount, or $3,375.

If it earned 20 per cent upon its invested capital, under the present law it would pay $5,500, but under the proposed law a thousand dollars less, or $4,500.

If it earns 25 per cent on its capital, under the present law it would pay $8,950, but under this proposed plan it would pay only $5,625.

If it earns 33⅓ per cent upon its capital, under the present law it would pay $14,700, but under the proposed law it would pay only about one-half that, or $7,500.

If it earns 50 per cent upon its invested capital, under the present law it would pay $26,200; under this proposed plan it would pay only $11,250.

All of these illustrations produce the same relative result. I appeal to Senators to consider whether that is what they want to do under this revenue bill. Are they willing to take the burden off those corporations which are earning these large percentages of income and increase the burden which they put upon those who are earning only modest incomes? That is what this proposed plan does.

Mr. KING. At this point it is pertinent, if the Senator will pardon me, to ask how it would affect large corporations, like the Steel Corporation, whose earnings this year probably would be considerably less than 8 per cent upon the invested capital?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will reach that, if the Senator will permit me, in the course of my argument.

Mr. President, I believe this table is so illuminating that it ought to be published in the RECORD, and I therefore ask that it may be published without further reading as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. In a speech I delivered in the Senate on October 11 I called attention to the fact that every corporation in the country earning less than 11.2 per cent would have an increase of 50 per cent in its normal tax under the proposed plan.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Utah undoubtedly realizes just the situation which I have been presenting.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Senator any statistics showing how many corporations there are in the country which pay 11 per cent and under 15 per cent?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have, and I am glad the Senator mentioned it, because I think it is wise to refer to it at this time.

The majority report of the Finance Committee gives such a table, based upon the returns for 1919, and the statement regarding that table is:

This table is based upon the latest Treasury statistics, which have been analyzed in detail, and covers all the corporations of the country which made full returns of invested capital in the year 1919.

That shows that there were 115,056 corporations making a profit and making a full return as to their incomes.

Of those 115,056 corporations, 10,689 made less than 5 per cent; 21,869 made from 5 to 10 per cent; 22,684 made between 10 and 15 per cent; 17,388 made between 15 and 20 per cent; 11,987 made from 20 to 25 per cent; and I rather think that while I am reading that, I had better also read the percentage of tax which they paid under the present law.

Those corporations earning less than 5 per cent, of course, paid the flat 10 per cent.

Those earning between 5 and 10 per cent paid 11.93 per cent.

Those earning between 10 and 15 per cent paid 21.6 per cent.

Those earning between 15 and 20 per cent paid 33.99 per cent.

Those earning between 20 and 25 per cent paid 41.51 per cent.

Mr. President, I ask leave to have this table printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Table showing average rate of excess-profits and income taxes upon corporations of different size.

[Average size of corporations (measured by invested capital) earning different rates of profit; corporation returns made in 1919.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As I have already stated, those corporations which are not earning less than 15 per cent will have their taxes increased, while all those earning above the 15 per cent will have their taxes decreased, and they are such corporations as the ones I have mentioned, earning between 20 and 25 per cent. There are 11,987 of them paying a rate of tax now of 41.51 per cent. This bill would reduce the taxes of those corporations until they would pay only a flat 15 per cent.

Of corporations earning between 25 and 30 per cent there were 7,743, paying an average tax of 51.22 per cent.

Of corporations earning from 30 to 40 per cent there were 9,050, paying 53.38 per cent.

Of corporations earning from 40 to 50 per cent there were 4,807, paying 57.58 per cent.

Of corporations earning from 50 to 75 per cent there were 4,911, paying a tax of 62.30 per cent.

Of corporations earning from 75 to 100 per cent there were 1,734, paying a tax rate of 64.24 per cent.

Of corporations earning over 100 per cent, there were 2,194, paying 67.40 per cent.

Mr. President, this proposed bill is to relieve all of those corporations which are paying those high rates under the present law, which are earning those higher percentages of income upon their invested capital, and not only to relieve them, but to put the burden upon those who are making lower incomes.

I do not like to use strong language, but, with no reflection on anybody who has had any connection with the preparation of this bill, I believe it is the most infamous thing that the human brain can devise.

I wish to call attention, in this connection, to some other facts which are quite relevant to this discussion. They are statistics based upon the earnings of corporations in 1918. Of course, at that time the earnings of corporations were comparatively large, considerably larger than they are now, and the figures which I will read are not illustrative of the actual figures under the existing state of incomes, but they do show a relation which has a direct bearing upon this problem now confronting us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the point he was just making——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am just adding to the point I was making. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Would the interests of justice be better subserved if a flat 10 per cent rate were imposed upon corporations, and then a tax upon undue or excess profits, graduated in character, were to supplement it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator to pardon me for the time being, because I expect to discuss that question a little later.

The table from which I have been reading was based upon averages.

In a matter of this sort averages, while they furnish some information, do not furnish us all that might be obtained. For the purpose of illustrating in more detailed degree, I present these figures that for the year 1918, 180 corporations had a net income of $2,554,000,000, more than one-fourth of the net income of all corporations combined. They paid an income tax—that is, the 10 per cent tax which was levied under that law—of only $203,000,000, but they paid an excess-profits tax of $848,000,000, showing the very high percentages which were earned upon their net income. The more than 300,000 other corporations earning more than $100,000 apiece paid an excess-profits tax of $285,000,000. In other words, there were 180 corporations earning such enormous profits that they paid more than three times the total amount of excess-profits tax paid by 300,000 other corporations earning more than $100,000 apiece.

Another statement: One thousand and twenty-six corporations had a net income of $4,255,000,000, just about one-half the total net income of 317,000 other corporations. These 1,026 corporations paid the 10 per cent income tax, amounting to only $333,000,000, but they paid an excess-profits tax of $1,422,000,000. That was $344,000,000 more than 316,500 other corporations paid. There were 9,534 corporations earning over $250,000 apiece. These paid an excess-profits tax of $2,218,000,000, five times the amount of their flat 10 per cent income tax, and seven-eighths of all the excess-profits taxes paid by all the corporations.

Moreover, I wish to call attention now to the further fact that all corporations between January 1, 1916, and July 12, 1921, made a net profit, a net income, of $47,000,000,000, and after payment of all their taxes they had left over $38,000,000,000. Four-fifths of these taxes were paid by less than 10,000 corporations, and one-half of them paid by 1,026 corporations.

Mr. KING. Is that possible—$38,000,000,000?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. After payment of all their taxes and all their expenses and after accounting for depreciation and obsolescence and every other deduction permitted by the present law they had left $38,000,000,000.

These 9,534 corporations in the year 1918 had a net income of $6,621,000,000, and after payment of the excess-profits tax of $2,218,000,000 had left for that year $4,403,000,000, while the 308,000 other corporations, with a net income of $1,738,000,000 and an excess-profits tax of $287,000,000, had left $1,451,000,000.

The 1,026 corporations with a net income of $4,253,000,000 and which paid an excess-profits tax of $1,451,000,000 had left, however, $2,802,000,000.

Now, Mr. President, I invite the attention of Senators to that situation. It shows what is going on under the present law. I do not believe that there can be advanced any substantial argument for the removal of the excess-profits tax unless we substitute for it something which will bring about a better result. As I stated in the beginning, it violates one of the fundamental principles of taxation. It does not bring about equality, but it is based upon that other fundamental principle of putting the tax upon those who are best able to bear it. If we can not find some substitute for it which will remove these fundamental objections, then I say it should be retained. But my judgment is that in this time of peace, when we are trying to frame a revenue bill which shall stand for the future, we can find a substitute, a substitute which will not violate the great principle of basing the tax upon ability to pay. I think we can find some other plan which will put into operation that other principle of equality of taxation which does not obtain with the excess-profits tax and which does not obtain under the proposed amendment offered by the committee and upon which we are to vote to-day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I do not understand that the net profits in 1918 of the corporations indicated by the Senator amounted to $38,000,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not say that was for 1918. I said it was from January 1, 1916, to July 21 of this year.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought it was the annual income.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Oh, no. I read the annual receipts.

Mr. KING. The net profit in any one year—that is, the maximum in any one year—was something less than $9,000,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the maximum income. It was not less than $9,000,000,000, and for the year 1916 it was something over $9,000,000,000, and I think that was the highest ever reached. I will state, however, that one reason why I believe it did not reach higher than $9,000,000,000 is because of the influence of the high taxes which we were putting upon them. I think owing to the high taxes that every corporation has sought in every conceivable way to reduce the amount of its income, and the very fact that we are now collecting from corporations $300,000,000 a year of income taxes, which are being adjusted and audited by the Treasury Department, demonstrates just what I have said.

In this connection I desire to refer to the report of the majority of the Finance Committee, which gives the reason for the repeal of the excess-profits tax and which refers to the table which I have just read as a basis for that repeal. I read from that report:

> The excess-profits tax has been so thoroughly discussed that it is unnecessary to state at length the reasons which have led your committee to recommend its repeal. The time for discussion is past and the time to repeal the tax has arrived. It may be mentioned, however, that further investigation has only accentuated the conviction that the inequalities of this tax make necessary its early repeal. Whatever may be its theoretical merits, in practice it exempts the overcapitalized corporation, falls more heavily upon corporations of small or moderate size than upon the larger corporations, penalizes business conservatism, and places upon the Bureau of Internal Revenue tasks which are beyond its strength.

Those are given as the reasons for the repeal of the excess-profits tax. I wish to analyze that very briefly.

The most important one is the statement that it applies the burden primarily to the small corporations and relieves the large corporations. That is true, but is the Congress of the United States committed to the policy of taxing one class of corporations more than another simply because of size? All of the large corporations of the country are corporations which comprise a large aggregation of individual stockholders.

Mr. President, the Pennsylvania Railroad is owned by more than 100,000 people, and the average investment of those 100,000 people is about $5,000. The United States Steel Corporation is owned by 75,000 people, who have an average investment of about $7,000. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. is owned by more than 100,000 people, whose average investment is about $4,000. Likewise with all of the so-called large corporations. Whenever a corporation actually reaches a high capital the stock of such corporation is always distributed to the public. In fact, that is what has been going on in the country. People have been organizing corporations with watered stock; those corporations have been retaining their net incomes in their treasuries until substance is put into the corporations, and they are placed upon a bare dividend paying basis, when the stock is distributed to the public. After the period for manipulation is over, after the period for earning large profits in the handling of such corporations is past, then their stocks are distributed and sold to the public and become virtually nothing but ordinary interest-bearing securities.

Mr. President, a tax upon that kind of a corporation simply because of its size is a discrimination against the small investors of the country, and whenever any tax is levied upon such a corporation it is levied upon every small investor at precisely the same rate as in the case of the large investor or the man with a large income, thereby specifically violating the fundamental principle that the tax should be imposed upon those who are best able to pay, because, after all, whenever a corporation pays any tax it is paying that tax for the stockholders, for the money which the corporation pays out is a proportion of the assets of every stockholder, at the same rate. A corporation being nothing but an aggregation of its stockholders, whenever a tax is imposed upon a corporation every stockholder of that concern is made to pay a tax at the same rate regardless of his income from other and all sources—a clear violation, as I have said, of the principle of having those pay who are best able to pay.

So, Mr. President, if all income of all corporations were distributed in dividends to their stockholders, it would be inequitable, except to a small degree, to which I shall refer later, to impose any tax upon any corporation, because a tax upon the corporation is a tax against the individual stockholders. If the income of all corporations is distributed, every stockholder pays his own Federal tax upon the same basis as every other individual in the land, but when any tax is imposed upon a corporation the small investors are made to pay at the highest rate which is paid by anybody in the country who owns any stock of such a corporation.

We all know that many people in this country who own stocks in corporations are small stockholders. I have here a most interesting table, prepared by the Actuary of the Treasury Department, Mr. McCoy, and a very astounding situation presents itself. This is an estimate of corporation statistics for the calendar year 1921. It supposes a net income of all corporations amounting to $4,800,000,000; it also supposes that two and one-half billion dollars of that will be distributed in dividends. What happens? Where is it distributed? Who gets it? What taxes does it pay after distribution? The table is most enlightening upon that subject. It is estimated that $500,000,000 of the $2,500,000,000 goes to stockholders who, if their dividend incomes came from other sources, would not pay any tax. What does that mean? It means that of the net income made by corporations in the year 1921, $500,000,000 of it belongs to people in this country who if it were all distributed would not pay any tax; and they should not pay any tax, because if single men their incomes are less than a thousand dollars and if married men their incomes are less than $2,000, and if their income came from other sources, we, I think, wisely exempt it from any taxation; but if we make the corporation pay the tax, the tax then is imposed upon widows and orphans who have been left a few shares of stock in big corporations precisely at the same rate as the man is taxed who has an income of a million dollars a year. Do we want to do that?

Morever, Mr. President, I have not the statistics of the number of people who own stock in corporations who would not pay any tax upon the net earnings of their holdings in corporations if distributed; but in the next bracket, embracing those having incomes of from one thousand, if single men, up to five thousand and from two thousand, if married men, up to five thousand, numbering 5,795,000 people, a part of their income is made up of dividends of corporations amounting to $200,000,000.

Of these five million seven hundred and ninety-five thousand 3 per cent of their net income is made up of dividends from corporations. It means, as I have said, as to the widows and orphans of this country who have inherited from their husbands and fathers small interests in these concerns, and as to the clerks and laboring men of this country who have been investing their savings in the large corporations which are supposed to be safe and earn regular dividends, taxing them at the same rate as the man is taxed who has an income of $1,000,000 from such sources.

This table is most interesting, and I should like to read from it further. Those under the present law coming within the bracket of incomes from $5,000 to $10,000 number 551,000, and 12 per cent of their income is derived from dividends of corporations; and if the two billion and a half dollars of corporate earnings to which I have referred were distributed they would receive $300,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $10,000 to $20,000, there are 105,000 taxpayers whose income to the extent of 23 per cent is from dividends of corporations, and in the distribution which we are considering they would receive $300,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $20,000 to $40,000, there are 29,500 whose net income is made up to the extent of 33 per cent of dividends of corporations, and who in the distribution referred to would receive $200,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $40,000 to $66,000, there are 12,600, 38 per cent of whose income is from dividends, and who in this distribution would receive $200,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $66,000 to $100,000, there are only 3,500, but 41 per cent of their income is from corporation dividends, and under this distribution they would receive $100,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $100,000 to $150,000, there are 1,662 taxpayers, 43 per cent of whose income is derived from corporations, and under this distribution they would receive $70,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $150,000 to $200,000, there are 650, 44 per cent of whose net income comes from corporations, and they would receive $40,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $200,000 to $500,000, there are 914 taxpayers, 45 per cent of whose income comes from corporations, and in this distribution they would receive $100,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $500,000 to $1,000,000, there are 120 taxpayers, 53 per cent of whose income is derived from dividends of corporations, and they would receive in this distribution $35,000,000.

In the next bracket, from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, there are 40 taxpayers, 52 per cent of whose net income is derived from corporations, and in this distribution they would receive $30,000,000.

In the bracket over $2,000,000 there are 14; 72 per cent of their income comes from corporations, and they would receive under this proposed distribution $25,000,000.

Mr. President, I ask that this table may be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

$200,000 to $500,000	914	45	100,000,000
$500,000 to $1,000,000	120	53	35,000,000
$1,000,000 to $2,000,000	40	52	30,000,000
Over $2,000,000	14	72	25,000,000
Total	6,500,000		1,600,000,000

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What does that mean? It means that whenever you have the corporation pay a tax for the stockholders, you are making these people up here who have no other income, even whose dividends would be exempt from taxation, pay at precisely the same rate as the man who has an income of over $2,000,000 a year, and whose income is composed of 72 per cent of dividends from corporations.

I submit, Senators, that you can not justify any such proposition as that. It violates as I say the very fundamental law that you shall place this burden upon those who are best able to bear it; but so far as your corporation tax is concerned, it violates that principle, and it violates the other eternal principle of equality; and when you remove your excess-profits tax and levy a flat tax upon corporations, you are destroying the one principle of the law now which can be justified. That is, with your excess-profits tax you are placing the burden upon those who are best able to pay, but when you have repealed that and put a flat tax upon corporations, you are violating both those great fundamental principles. You are placing the tax not upon those who are best able to pay, because you are making every one of those stockholders pay at the same rate regardless of his total income, and you are not placing the tax upon those who are best able to pay, because you are taxing every corporation precisely alike. Whether the income is small or large, whether the percentage is modest or represents the profiteer, you tax them alike.

I appeal to you, are you willing in this time of peace, when you are framing a revenue law which is supposed to operate for the future, when the business of this country is depressed, when whatever taxes we levy are going to be a burden, to place upon the people of this country an unjust tax in the first place and an unequal tax in the next?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he believes that in such times as we have now the distribution of earnings by corporations should be encouraged or compelled?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will reach that a little later. I expect to discuss that as one of the objections to the plan which I am proposing.

Mr. President, not only is this tax unequal, as between individuals who have net incomes from corporations and those whose incomes come from other investments, but it violates both of the principles I have named. It is not imposed upon those who are best able to pay, and it is not equal as between individuals who have interests in corporations and those who have interests in other investments.

Now, I wish to call attention to the inequality which exists between the man engaged in business as an individual and the men who are doing business as a corporation.

The people who are doing business as a corporation under this proposed plan pay only a tax of 15 per cent. If the man is doing business, or has an income on the outside, he pays not only a normal tax of 8 per cent, but he pays surtaxes reaching up to 50 per cent, as proposed now in this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the Senator's plan would not every corporation making a net income at all have to pay 50 per cent upon at least one-half of its income?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to pardon me for a minute. I intend to discuss that later.

As between the members of a partnership and a corporation, you levy a tax upon the interest of every partner, regardless of whether his income is represented in the business or not, and those surtaxes may reach as high as 50 per cent under the proposed bill, and, with the normal tax, as high as 58 per cent, while the man with his investment in a corporation would not pay in any event over 15 per cent. Now, I ask you to consider what is going to be the effect of that kind of a law.

The minority members of this committee have prepared a table showing to some extent just how that will operate, which I ask permission to insert in my remarks without reading.

There being no objection, the table referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. This table, however, was prepared upon the theory that the surtaxes on individual incomes would not exceed 32 per cent, and does not portray the situation in all of its enormity as it would exist under the law as now amended, increasing those surtaxes to 50 per cent; but, based upon 32 per cent surtaxes only, here is what we find: An individual doing business who has a net income of $50,000 a year will pay 18.38 per cent on it, but a partnership with two partners will pay 11.52 per cent, with four partners 7.16 per cent, with five partners 5.90 per cent; and the corporation declaring no dividends, including the tax upon the dividends which belong to the stockholders, will pay 14.20 per cent. I suppose that odd percentage is put in there by the actuaries because of the supposed exemption from tax by the corporations. Without considering the exemption which has now been taken from corporations earning above $25,000, it would be a flat 15 per cent. If that corporation declared 50 per cent of its earnings in dividends, then we find that as to that corporation with four stockholders there would be derived from the income of that corporation 15.26 per cent, and with a greater number of stockholders a little less percentage, between 14.20 and 14.52. Then the result is figured out as to where they declare 100 per cent in dividends and get the tax from the stockholders as well as the corporation.

It shows the statistics bearing upon these various earnings. It becomes very marked, as Senators have doubtless observed, in the very small earnings. If there are several partners, the tax upon the partners—assuming that they have no income from other sources—would be less than the 15 per cent; and to operate even that way as an inequality against the corporation is wrong in principle. We want it as nearly equal as we can get it; but when you get into the higher earnings the situation is very markedly reversed. If the individual has an earning of $100,000 he pays 31.19 per cent tax upon that—that is, assuming that he has no income from other sources. If it is a partnership with two partners, they pay 18.38 per cent. If it is a corporation, and no dividends are declared, it pays only 14.7 per cent. If there are four stockholders they pay 15.56 per cent, and so on. If they earn $500,000 the individual would pay 37.69 per cent, the partnership with two partners would pay at the rate each of 35.39 per cent, and the corporation declaring no dividends would pay only at the rate of 14.94 per cent. If it earned over $25,000, under this amendment which was agreed to yesterday, it, of course, would pay a flat 15 per cent.

When we get into the higher brackets it is even worse; but there is one thing which I wish to emphasize. As the number of stockholders increases of course the rate becomes less, because it is divided up; but even with a considerable number of stockholders we find this situation: We will take the corporation with a million dollars net income. If the individual has it, he will pay 38.85 per cent of a tax. If two partners have it, they pay 37.69 per cent. As the number of partners increases, of course the relative rate decreases; but the corporation, if it pays no dividend, will pay only 15 per cent.

Bear that in mind. If the corporation pays no dividends, its net income will be taxed only at the rate of 15 per cent. If it pays dividends, then its rate of taxation—where there are several stockholders, of course—will decrease from that of the individual; but if it declares 100 per cent in dividends, and there are four stockholders, the rate of taxation of each of those stockholders is 42.48 per cent. If there are five stockholders, they pay at the rate of 41.36 per cent. If there are eight stockholders, they pay at the rate of 38 per cent.

Mr. President, what is the inevitable result, if that system is adopted, if a corporation, regardless of the percentage of its income, is paying a flat tax of only 15 per cent? Every business in this country which is earning any considerable amount of income would be driven into incorporating. You can not escape that result.

I have a table here, prepared by an eminent lawyer who has given great study to this question of taxation, which shows the amount of tax which would be paid by an individual on a given income and the rate of that tax and the amount and rate of the tax on a corporation earning the same amount of income and setting out the difference.

It shows that if the income is $32,000, an individual would pay $4,600 of tax, or at the rate of 14.5 per cent. If a corporation had that income, paying a 15 per cent tax, there would be a difference in favor of the individual of $200.

If the income were $66,000, the individual would pay $15,000, or 23 per cent; the corporation would pay $9,900, a difference in favor of the corporation of $5,100. I will state, by the way, that this table is made up upon the assumption that the surtaxes will not exceed 32 per cent.

If the income were $100,000, the individual would pay a tax of $29,000, or 29 per cent; the corporation would pay only $15,000, a difference of $13,800.

If the income were $300,000, the individual would pay $109 000, or at the rate of 38 per cent, while the corporation would pay only $45,000, a difference in favor of the corporation of $64,000.

If the income were $1,000,000, the individual would pay a tax of $389,000, or at the rate of 38.9 per cent, and the corporation would pay only $150,000, a difference in favor of the corporation of $239,000. I submit the table, to be printed as a part of my remarks.

The table referred to is as follows:

Income.	Individual tax.	Rate, about.	Corporation tax rate, 15 per cent.	Difference.
		Per cent.
$32,000	$4,600	14½	$4,800	$200
$66,000	15,000	23	9,900	5,100
$100,000	29,000	29	15,000	13,800
$1,000,000	389,000	38.9	150,000	239,000

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask Senators to consider that table for just one moment. What will be the result? Every individual or partnership doing business and making any considerable income will be driven to organize a corporation so as to pay only a 15 per cent tax, and may keep its earnings in the corporation forever free from any other tax in the way of a surtax upon individual income.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I want to ask the Senator a question, and I ask it only for information. If I understand his plan, taking for illustration a fire-insurance company——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator to excuse me from discussing my plan now, until I get through with this, when I will be glad to be interrogated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him now whether in the case of a fire insurance company he intends to tax the increase or surplus each year? Is that his object?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask the Senator to excuse me from replying to that now. I expect to reach that plan later on.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not know whether the Senator was ready to answer now or not.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the plan proposed by the committee is unequal between businesses in another respect. Take the individual or the business or the partnership in business earning an income. The individual is charged a surtax on that income. If his income in one year is a hundred thousand dollars, you charge him a normal tax and a high surtax. If his income is reduced the surtax is reduced proportionately. If he makes a loss, of course he pays no tax, but when he does make a large net income he pays a high tax, he pays the surtaxes; but the corporation making earnings in the same way, whenever it makes a high net income, pays the same old flat rate of 15 per cent only. Now, think of that. If an individual makes good earnings one year he is penalized, but not so with a corporation, because it always has the flat tax only, and whether the earnings are high or low the rate is always the same; but not so with either the individual or partnership. Whenever their earnings rise the rate of tax is increased, a direct and an inevitable favoritism to those who are doing business through corporations.

I submit that if this thing is done it will drive all of these businesses into incorporating, and the anticipated revenue from the individual taxes will very materially decrease. The Government will not get the revenue, because under this bill there is every inducement for a man making any considerable amount of money in business to organize a corporation.

Do Senators want that result? That jeopardizes a large per cent of the income which the proponents of this bill are expecting under the bill from taxes upon individual incomes. It will force these people into incorporating, and when they are incorporated they will all pay a flat 15 per cent. They will consider these mutations from year to year in the conduct of their business; they will hope that some time they may make a large income, and when they do, if it is a corporation, they will pay only 15 per cent upon it, but if an individual or partnership will pay an increasingly higher rate, and as a matter of safety, every individual or concern with any considerable income in his business will be forced to organize a corporation, where he can take advantage of a flat tax of 15 per cent only regardless of the amount of his income. There will be no variation there. His business may go up or it may go down, but as a corporation he can always count on the tax being only 15 per cent. But if he earns as an individual $100,000 a year, as I said, he would be paying $29,000 of it, or at the rate of 29 per cent, instead of 15 per cent. If he earns $300,000 he would be paying at the rate of 38 per cent. If he earns $1,000,000 he would be paying at the rate of 38.9 per cent; but if he incorporates his business he always has that good old flat 15 per cent rate to rely upon. It will never get higher than that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the stockholder can get any benefit for himself, he will have to pay a surtax upon the dividends he receives.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I suppose I might as well consider that question now as later.

Mr. LENROOT. In that connection, while the Senator is discussing that, I wish he would discuss this also: Where a corporation distributes dividends annually, the surtax rate, of course, would be very much less on the stockholder than if the dividends are withheld and are distributed in a cumulative way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this question of the distribution of dividends and taxation is a most interesting phase of this entire subject. As I said, if all the net incomes of corporations were distributed in dividends to their stockholders, equality would require that the corporations pay no tax, unless it be, perhaps, a franchise tax, or something of that sort. But corporations do not do that. In August, 1917, in discussing the revenue bill at that time, I presented a mass of testimony, and if Senators want to study this question, and I hope they will, they may find it in the speech which I delivered on August 20, 1917, the legislative day of August 15, 1917.

I shall not burden the Senate at this time with repeating that testimony, but I believe that I demonstrated at that time, produced sufficient facts to establish beyond all controversy, that in ordinary times the corporations of this country retained at least 50 per cent of their net income without distribution. I gave the statistics as to various lines of business. I showed some individual instances which were marvelous to behold, showing an astonishingly great percentage of earnings of closely held corporations which were not distributed.

I can call to mind now one illustration which I got from the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce not a great while ago, when we were considering the packer legislation. Mr. Armour himself went upon the stand and made the statement that the Armour Packing Co. was organized back in the sixties with a capital stock of only $150,000, and that in all the years since they had not paid out in dividends to exceed 12 per cent of their earnings. We know the marvelous size of that institution now, that it not only has its capital stock of a hundred million dollars or more, but, as I understand it, is the owner practically of 700 subsidiary corporations. It built up its capital by retaining the net income in the corporation and distributing little in dividends. Mr. Armour's family, under the bill proposed by the Senate committee, would pay only a flat tax of 15 per cent on the 88 per cent of the earnings of that concern which remain in the business undistributed. But if distributed and added to the outside income of those stockholders, how much would they pay? Are you willing to stand for that proposition?

Moreover, it is stated in the majority report that the returns of taxpayers with incomes of over $300,000 are diminishing in number. That is true. The number has diminished about one-half, and what are they doing with that money? We have been told here that they are investing it in tax-exempt securities.

I say to you that that is a small amount compared to investments elsewhere to prevent taxation. What are they doing with it? Read the financial journals of the country. Read the statement which appears in the majority report of the Finance Committee. We find in the majority report, in explaining why the incomes above $300,000 have been diminishing, the statement that people are "placing their money in investments which promise well for the future, but yield no immediate returns."

What does that mean? That means, Mr. President, that they are still organizing corporations with their watered stock on which they do not expect to pay any dividends for years to come. They expect the corporation to be one great repository of their gain on which they will pay no tax except this 15 per cent. They are buying these other stocks in corporations already organized which were made up largely of water, where the undistributed income is accumulating. They are buying those stocks hoping for the day to come when they may reap dividends under legislation upon which they will have to pay a less tax than now. That is where the high incomes are going. The amount going into tax-exempt securities is infinitesimal compared with the very large amount which is going into these securities which "promise well for the future."

Mr. President, I believe that indicates a situation——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I was obliged to be absent from the Chamber for a moment. Has the Senator discussed the question of compelling the distribution of dividends and then the effect upon the country?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I have not answered that, but will come to that when I reach the discussion of the remedy for the situation. I do not believe in legislation for the specific purpose of compelling the distribution of dividends, and the plan which I propose, as I will show later, will not in my judgment do that.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator, I take it, then, admits that there are two propositions involved that he thinks would result in corporations retaining their surplus earnings rather than distributing them—one to take care of a lean year as against a prosperous year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. And the other in the hope that at some future time surtaxes might be reduced?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; that is true, and the same thing is true of the individual or partnership in business. I think in prosperous years they should retain a considerable percentage of their net income to take care of lean years or less prosperous years.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to know whether I correctly understand the Senator's amendment, because I should like to consider it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am just coming to consider the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I mean as to its effect. Am I to understand that if there is no distribution made the Government would collect under his amendment 39.2 per cent of the net earnings of a corporation?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If there is no distribution made it would not amount to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it amounts to 39.2, or $392 on each thousand dollars.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It may. But I would prefer not to go into that just now, because the rates which I presented here, as I said in the beginning, are merely tentative, merely suggestive. If the principle be adopted we can agree upon proper rates, I am sure. The rates I have presented are merely suggestive.

Mr. President, I think the result of this legislation will be that if it once becomes embedded in the minds of the country that the principle of the legislation is to continue and become a part of the permanent legislation of the country, it will inevitably drive into corporations all business of individuals and partnerships making a considerable net income in amount, and the small corporation where the earnings would be less would probably disincorporate and become a partnership. I think that would be the effect of it, because from the table which I read a short time ago from the report of the minority members of the Finance Committee it appears that in certain cases a partnership with a small income would pay much less than the flat 15 per cent rate. It works an inequality in that way. It penalizes the corporation with a small income, unless it be that the effect of that exemption of $2,000 on corporations with $25,000 a year income or less would equalize that; but that has not been figured out in the table which I presented. That might change the result so that with small earnings a partnership would not in any case pay a less tax than the corporation would pay. It would drive all of the partnerships making a large income into corporations, likewise the individual, and I do not believe that we want to bring about any such result as that. We desire to equalize taxation upon the various incomes as nearly as we can.

What should be done? Let us discuss the remedy. I think I have pointed out the evils which will flow from the proposed legislation. Now, can we not do something to remedy that situation? If corporations could be taxed the same as partnerships we would have no trouble with the situation. The individual partners pay an income tax with a surtax upon all of their incomes, whether they take it out of the business or not. If the corporation distributed all its net income to its shareholders then we would have everybody taxed alike, with the advantage to the stockholder of the corporation in that he would be getting his in hand. It would be cash. He would have that advantage if the corporation distributed it all.

But corporations do not distribute it all. They do not distribute a large percentage. It is estimated by the actuary, I believe, that ordinarily corporations of all classes joined together distribute only from 70 to 75 per cent of their net income in dividends. But it also appears that corporations which are closely owned, so-called close corporations, retain a very much higher percentage. Of course, at this time of business depression the large corporations are paying out a higher percentage of their net income than in normal times, and the retained income now is not so great as it will be in the prosperous years which we hope and pray are not far away; but in ordinarily prosperous times closely owned corporations do not distribute, as I have said, more than 50 per cent of their earnings as dividends.

Let us take the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to-day. It is distributing all of its net income in dividends. It is even distributing more than its net income in dividends. It is paying dividends out of surplus. It has reduced the percentage of dividends and is still paying out of its surplus a part of the dividends.

Will anyone please tell me why the net income of that corporation ought to be taxed at all, because when those dividends are declared and they are paid to the stockholder, the stockholder returns those dividends as a part of his income and pays taxes upon them.

Mr. LENROOT. He only pays the surtax, and the corporation tax now is just about equal to the normal tax of the individual.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is the purpose of it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; the Senator certainly does not mean about equal to the normal tax of the individual. The normal tax of the individual averages about 7½ per cent and the flat tax upon the corporation would be 15 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. I am speaking of the present law.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The present law would make it 10 per cent instead of 7½ per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Not quite 10 per cent, because the corporation has an exemption of $2,000 on the normal tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; but in the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. that would not amount to anything. Taking that case, all of the net income is distributed, and a large part of it is distributed to stockholders who would not pay any tax on it, and a large part to stockholders who would only pay the 4 per cent normal tax on it. Now you are proposing to increase that tax to 15 per cent on the income of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. regardless of the amount of its income, and to that extent it is, in the case of that railroad, a direct tax upon transportation to the extent of 15 per cent, and largely a tax which would not be levied in the hands of the stockholders if all the dividends were distributed, as they are, and the tax paid by the individual.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator's argument, as I understand it, then, leads to the complete abolition of taxes upon corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not by any means.

Mr. SMOOT. Where all the income is distributed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; where the income is all distributed in dividends; yes.

Mr. KING. That is what I mean.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Then let us see what should be done. If the income is all distributed in dividends, there should be no tax upon the corporation except, as I have suggested, a tax upon franchises or something of that kind. If that were done, we should have every individual in the land paying taxes precisely at the same rate; we should have exact equality among the taxpayers of the country; we should have every dollar of dividends earned in the country paying taxes at precisely the same rate; but the corporations do not distribute their income in dividends.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. If that were done, would it not be true that nobody would pay any normal tax upon corporate earnings?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, at the beginning of my remarks I suggested other amendments, and one of them was that every individual should pay the normal tax and the corporation not pay any; that we change the law in that respect so as to make the individual pay all of the tax on corporation dividends and not have the corporation pay any of it. To the extent income is distributed we have equality now. If we do not have the corporation pay any tax, we have equality to that extent; if the income is distributed in dividends, we then have equality; to the extent the corporation makes the distribution we have equality; but the corporations do not do that.

Where is the difficulty? What is the thing we wish to reach? Let us reach that part of the earnings of corporations which is not distributed. That is the only logical course to pursue. As to the distributed part, let the individual pay all of the tax and we have equality; but as to the undistributed part, what are we going to do about that? There is but one conclusion which can follow, and that is as inevitable as the day follows the night; that is that there should be put upon the undistributed dividends a graduated tax equal, as nearly as may be, to the normal tax and the surtaxes which individuals would pay if the dividends were distributed. Is not that where we want to touch the sore spot? If we can do that we shall have taxed every dollar of income and have taxed it equally; we shall have maintained the fundamental principle of making him pay who is best able to pay. We shall have also maintained the other principle, that of equality among those who enjoy the same degree of prosperity.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I thoroughly agree with the theory which has been stated by the Senator from New Mexico, but the earnings to which he refers will some day be distributed. Does the Senator propose that as to the undistributed earnings which would be subject to this tax when those earnings are hereafter distributed they shall be exempt from any taxes?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is my proposal.

Mr. LENROOT. That is not found in the Senator's amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am again sorry——

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wanted to know the Senator's position. I did not want to criticize it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am again sorry that the Senator from Wisconsin was not present at the opening of my remarks, because at that time I made the statement that I would suggest, if taxes were placed upon the undistributed earnings in the degree which I propose, that when they are subsequently distributed they be free from taxation in the hands of the stockholders.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the Senator's proposition would be that on a distribution of any earnings in a year subsequent to that in which they are taxable they should be free from any taxes?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I would provide that all dividends should first be paid out of current earnings; that no dividends should be paid except out of current earnings if those earnings were sufficient to meet the dividends; and only permit the payment of previously accumulated earnings in the event that the current dividends were not ample.

Mr. LENROOT. And then exempt those from taxation?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And exempt only the portion of the dividends which were paid out of undistributed earnings on which the tax had been paid.

Mr. LENROOT. That is about the same thing that I said, that the Senator would not tax dividends which were distributed during a subsequent year out of earnings of a previous year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is my understanding of the Senator's thought. Now, I propose in this amendment to base the tax upon the percentage of net income retained. I am indebted for that suggestion to the Credit Men's Association of this country. In the proposal which I made in 1917 to tax undistributed income, I sought at one time to put a graduated tax upon it, but, owing to the peculiar situation then existing, I felt it advisable to make it a flat tax on the undistributed income, and a small one; but the Credit Men's Association of this country has suggested a graduated tax based upon the percentage of the total net income retained in the business and undistributed. It is argued that, inasmuch as the tax upon the undistributed earnings is to take the place eventually of the individual normal tax and surtax, it ought to range about in the same way along the same gradations as the individual normal tax and surtax. That is why the percentages which are placed in the amendment have been suggested.

The Credit Men's Association, basing its suggestion upon the report of the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, that all these taxes ought not to be higher than 20 per cent upon business, presented a tentative rate ranging from 4 per cent up to 28 per cent, and in the amendment which I have proposed, inasmuch as we have increased our surtaxes up to 50 per cent, and the normal tax added to it will make it 58 per cent, I have made the gradations from 8 per cent up to 56 per cent; but the average rate of tax is such that if a corporation retains only 10 per cent of its net income it will pay upon that amount retained only 8 per cent——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not mean 8 per cent, but eight-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It would be eight-tenths of 1 per cent on the whole; the Senator is right, and I thank him for the correction, but it would be 8 per cent of the 10 per cent. If they retained as much as 20 per cent, on the additional 10 per cent they would pay 16 per cent, making an average of 12 per cent on the 20 per cent of their net earnings retained; if they retained 30 per cent they would pay 24 per cent, making an average tax of 16 per cent; if they retained as much as 40 per cent, the average tax would be 20 per cent; if they retained 50 per cent, the average tax would be 24 per cent; if they retained 60 per cent, the average tax would be 28 per cent; and if they retained over 60 per cent, the average tax would then only be 32 per cent. So I take it that the rates will not be considered excessive, in view of the fact that the average surtaxes only upon distributed dividends are estimated by Mr. McCoy at 16 per cent.

It will be recalled that I read into the RECORD a while ago a table showing the various percentages of individual incomes which are derived from dividends. Those dividends in great degree find their way into the hands of those who pay the high surtaxes. So Mr. McCoy has estimated that the average surtax upon distributed dividends is 16 per cent under the present law, and most of the distributed dividends go, of course, into the hands of those who pay the higher surtaxes. When we provide that the individual shall also pay the normal tax upon distributed dividends the rate goes higher. That would add 7½ per cent. It is estimated that the average normal tax upon distributed dividends is 7½ per cent.

Very few people who pay the 4 per cent normal tax receive dividends, and the brackets which I have presented are modest as compared with the surtaxes which the Government would receive if the dividends were distributed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Right on that question I want to ask the Senator if it would not be possible to accomplish the same result by a more simple amendment to the income-tax provision? I should like to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I have listened to his argument, and I am very much interested in what he is saying. I think he has made an admirable presentation of this phase of the taxing question.

The object of the Senator, as I understand it, is—and it seems to me to be just—to require the payment of taxes on the undistributed earnings of corporations at the same rate, or as nearly at the same rate as the Senator can reach, that the individual would have to pay if the earnings were distributed. Could not the Senator by a single amendment to the income-tax provision of the bill provide that corporations on their undistributed earnings should be taxed the same as individuals, and thus pay exactly the same rate that individuals would pay if the earnings were distributed?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if that could be done without involving us in other and greater difficulties, of course it would be what we all want, because the suggestion is intended as one making toward equality, and that is what we all want. That, however, could not be done, for this reason: Whenever you vary the tax according to the actual amount of the net income, you are discriminating violently between stockholders of closely held corporations and those where the stock is widely distributed, and you are not meeting the question of equality of taxation; or, at least, while you do meet in a way the question of ability to pay you do it in a way which involves us in so many discriminations that it has been thought wise not to adopt that principle.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question about a matter which I do not quite understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Given a corporation with a net earning of $50,000 owned by two stockholders, and a partnership with two partners, as I figure it under the Senator's amendment, if the earnings were not distributed the partnership would pay a tax, each individual, of 17.28 per cent, while the corporation with the same two stockholders would pay 39.2 per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not get the Senator's point.

Mr. LENROOT. Given a corporation with $100,000 net earnings, under the Senator's amendment the tax would be 39.2 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the corporation kept it all.

Mr. LENROOT. If it kept it all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Assume that that corporation is owned by two stockholders, and that there is a partnership doing a similar business, making the same earnings, in which there are two partners. Under the present income-tax law, they would be taxed 17.28 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just a moment. I will verify the Senator's figures.

Mr. LENROOT. The only reason why I asked the question was that I understood the Senator to say that he thought it would drive partnerships into corporations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator did not understand me. I said that it would drive small corporations into partnerships and drive large partnerships into corporations. It is so unequally balanced that it has the very peculiar effect at a certain point of driving partnerships into corporations and at another point of driving the small corporation out of business into a partnership.

Mr. LENROOT. My question is, Would not the Senator's amendment drive corporations into partnerships?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator, I am again sorry to say, was not present when I suggested a still further amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very sorry.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It was that corporations might exercise the option of making returns as partnerships or partnerships might exercise the option of making returns as corporations for the sake of uniformity and to meet just such objections as the Senator has now raised.

Mr. President, the plan which I have suggested has been receiving from time to time greater support. When the thought was suggested by me to the Finance Committee in 1917, it was what may be called my hobby, and from day to day in the Finance Committee I kept, as one would say, pounding it in. The other day, when I said that I was going to propose it again to the Senate now, a tax expert said to me that it was a subject which required time to soak in. That is what I hope to accomplish now, if nothing more—to present this question in such a way that it will soak in, not only into the minds of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, but it ought to, and in my humble judgment it will, soak into the minds of the people of this country, because the building up of corporations by the retention of their net income free from equal taxation is a menace to the revenue of our country.

Much has been said here about overcapitalization, but I want to say this: I do not care how large a corporation is if the stockholders, when they organize it, will put into it dollar for dollar of the stock which is issued; but when you organize a corporation with watered stock with the avowed intention of retaining the net income of that corporation free from proper taxation for the purpose of evading your income taxes and to accumulate a fortune for the future, when you make investments—using the language of the majority report of the Finance Committee—which will go into unproductive concerns but which "promise well for the future," you effectually escape taxation, and I would prevent it.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] asked this question a while ago: "Would this plan tend to force distribution of earnings of corporations?" It will force it under certain circumstances, but under certain circumstances only. You will remember that I stated a while ago that the average surtax upon distributed earnings of corporations to those who pay any tax amounts to 16 per cent; but corporations are controlled and the payment of dividends is controlled by the largest stockholders or those representing the largest stockholders—by those who, if they distributed the net income of the corporation in dividends, would be required then to pay high surtaxes on it; and no distribution will be forced until the amount of the tax on the undistributed earnings of the corporation will exceed the personal taxes which those directors would have to pay on their share of the dividends when distributed, not only the surtaxes but the normal tax. So I say that you force no distribution on the average until you reach probably 30 or 40 per cent, and these brackets which I have provided here retaining up to 60 per cent amount to only 32 per cent on the average; and if this plan forces any distribution, it forces only that which would pay up to the point where the stockholder would be benefited and pay less tax by paying it as an individual than by leaving it in the corporation.

As I said, however, if these rates are not right, if anyone wants to suggest a change in rates, well and good; we are ready to consider it; but there can be no doubt that a graduated tax should be levied upon these undistributed incomes somewhat analogous or equivalent to the taxes upon individual incomes and upon this very money if distributed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I thoroughly agree with what the Senator says up to a certain point; but, as I gather the figures, a director of a corporation would have to have a dividend of more than $100,000 out of that corporation to his personal income before he would anywhere reach the percentage the Senator imposes by his amendment. I doubt very much whether there are many corporations in the country distributing dividends where that will be true, and anything below that, of course, would tend to force the distribution of earnings.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am not sure that I get clearly what the Senator has in mind; I was trying to think of what he was saying and another matter at the same time.

Mr. LENROOT. If I may interrupt the Senator further, the income tax on a net income of $100,000 under the present law is about 31 per cent, whereas under the Senator's amendment the percentage imposed upon undistributed earnings, assuming none are distributed, is 39.2 per cent. It seems to me very clear that it would force the distribution of earnings, except in cases where the directors controlling the situation received so large a dividend out of the earnings that they would pay less by distribution than if it was not distributed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I ask the Senator if he has also figured out how much the corporation would have to distribute in order to put the two cases on a parity?

Mr. LENROOT. That is assuming a given income. To the 16⅔ per cent which the Senator said is the average, it seems to me we must add the normal tax of 8 per cent, and 24 per cent would be the maximum.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I said the average; but I said these corporations are controlled by directors whose incomes from the corporation and from outside sources are much above that average amount. I think at any rate it would reach as high as 35 per cent, on the average. If you take the directors who control the corporations of the country, and take into consideration the incomes which they have from other sources which would be added to these distributed dividends from the corporations, although it is a mere estimate, I think their rate of taxation on the average would range at least to 35 or 40 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. I could not say; all I know is what the table shows; but on $100,000 income the total tax would be 31 and a fraction per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; but in order to establish some system of equality, would the Senator have any serious objection to making an inducement for the corporation to pay out some of its earnings in dividends?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say very frankly that if a plan can be devised so that a corporation will never make nor lose by retaining its dividends, it would be very desirable. There should be no inducement either way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right, and if we could find some Solomon who could devise such a plan, we would all be very happy.

But the Senator said this plan suggested by me would force distribution to a certain extent until you got down to a certain level. I want to call the attention of the Senator to how the proposed law would operate in the present situation. If a corporation retained all of its earnings, it would only pay 15 per cent. If it retained half of them, it would be equivalent to 30 per cent of the amount retained. If it paid out in dividends 75 per cent, it would equal 60 per cent of the amount retained.

Mr. LENROOT. Hardly that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If it paid out 85 per cent, it would be equivalent to 100 per cent on that which is retained.

Mr. LENROOT. Hardly that. I think the Senator will concede that he must consider the normal tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is right, of course, but in such percentages as this the normal tax would not cause the figures to vary very greatly. So under the proposed plan of the committee there is an inducement varying from 15 per cent to 100 per cent in favor of keeping the earnings in the corporation and not distributing them. That is the proposed law. Is that any better than this plan, which would probably offer an inducement for the distribution of perhaps half of the net incomes of corporations?

That is the inducement under this proposed plan offered by the committee, that if they keep it all in the corporation, they pay only 15 per cent on what is retained. If they keep 50 per cent and pay out 50 per cent, then they are paying an average of 30 per cent on what is retained. If they pay out 75 per cent, then they are paying 60 per cent on what is retained. If they paid out 85 per cent, they are paying 100 per cent on what is retained, the most powerful influence which can be devised for the purpose of preventing the distribution of earnings of corporations and subjecting them to the surtaxes in the hands of the individual stockholders.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not been able quite to understand the language of the Senator's amendment, and I find a good many Senators in the same predicament. I thought at first this was a tax graduated in proportion to the rate of profits the corporation was making. Now I find Senators who insist that it does not make any difference whether a corporation is making 10 or 20 or 30 or 40 or 50 per cent; under the Senator's amendment it would pay the same rate of taxation upon its earnings not distributed. Is that right?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite right; and it is because what the Senator thinks ought to be done would involve the question of invested capital, the question which is involved in the excess-profits tax, and which is the very reason, in my judgment, for the repeal of the excess-profits tax. It would involve us in all that maze of difficulty; so this plan has been devised.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the effect of this to levy a higher rate of taxation on the corporation making a low rate of dividend than upon the corporation making a large rate?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As I stated to the Senator, it does not take into consideration the rate at all, for the reasons which I have stated.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It does not take into consideration the rate, but is the effect to tax the corporation which is making 50 per cent profit less than a corporation is taxed which is making 10 per cent profit?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is not. It does not reach that at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking the Senator whether the effect of this tax will be to levy a rate of tax upon the earnings of a corporation earning a small profit more than is levied upon a corporation whose earnings are large?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It will have this effect, if the Senator please, that to the extent that it induces distribution of corporate earnings and gets them into the hands of those who pay surtaxes it will increase the taxes. It is a graduated tax, however, based upon the assumed theory that the undistributed earnings ought somehow to be made to pay a graduated tax corresponding to the surtaxes which individuals pay and which these incomes would pay if in the hands of individuals.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose a corporation capitalized for half a million dollars makes a half million dollars in a year—100 per cent—and distributes it all to its stockholders. Does it pay any tax?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If it makes only 10 per cent profit and fails to distribute it to its stockholders, then it would pay the tax?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It would pay the 10 per cent tax, and that tax ultimately would be considered in connection with the income of the stockholder; if it was ever distributed to the stockholder at all the stockholder would be exempt from that amount of tax paid by the corporation on his undistributed interest in the corporation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that; but I think the language is a little difficult to understand.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The language is involved because it was written by the experts. Perhaps I should not say it is involved because of that, but I suggested at the beginning of my remarks that it is the language of the expert draftsmen. The effect of it, however, is to impose a graduated tax, based upon the percentage of the retained net income.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the junior Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the Senator's amendment, the corporation which distributes all its earnings in dividends is not affected, whether it is a big one or a little one, by the amendment; in other words, if a corporation wants to avoid the payment of the tax provided for in this amendment, all it has to do is to distribute its dividends among its stockholders?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Quite right; and I was going to say that there was some argument for putting a tax upon corporations, varying with respect to the size of the corporations, because when you have a large corporation, no matter if it is an aggregation of a large number of individuals owning the stock equally, it gives to that aggregation a power to influence prices or other things which lesser aggregations would not have; but if you want to tax corporations because they are corporations there are other ways which would more equitably do it. You tax them when you levy a franchise tax. If a flat franchise tax is not adequate, levy a graduated franchise tax. There is no reason why you can not do it. But these incomes, when considered from the mere standpoint of the benefit to the individual stockholder, ought to be taxed upon the basis and the basis only that they would be taxed on if distributed to the stockholders.

This question is being considered thoroughly. It is being considered now by many of the experts of the country, and the idea is growing that some such scheme as this is the only equitable scheme, so long as you propose to tax net incomes.

As I said, this is receiving support. In the report of Secretary Houston for 1920, the Secretary considered the question of the repeal of the excess-profits tax. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] a day or so ago referred to that as very excellent authority for the repeal of the excess-profits tax, but I want to read a little further and show what the Secretary said about that matter. He did advocate the repeal of the excess-profits tax, but here is what he said further:

> The excess-profits tax, however, must be replaced, not merely repealed, and I believe that it should be replaced in large part by some form of corporation profits tax. This conclusion is based not only upon the Government's need for revenue but upon grounds of equality and justice. So long as taxpayers other than corporations are subject to a progressive income tax, rising now to over 70 per cent, corporation profits should not be allowed to escape with a single tax of only 10 per cent.

By this you are seeking to make it 15 per cent; but what is 15 per cent compared with 72 per cent? The Secretary continues:

> Individuals (and partnerships in effect) pay normal taxes and surtaxes upon all net income, whether spent, saved, or retained in the business of the taxpayer. Corporations pay only normal tax on such income, although their stockholders pay in addition surtaxes on the profits of the corporation which are distributed as dividends. But no surtaxes are paid on or with respect to the profits not distributed. It seems plain, therefore, that when the excess-profits tax is repealed some equivalent or compensatory tax should be placed upon the corporation in lieu of the surtax upon reinvested income paid by other taxpayers. Unless this be done, a heavy premium would be given to the corporate form of business. If, for example, three equal partners in a business invest capital of $2,000,000 and make net profits of $600,000, draw out $75,000 as salary and $75,000 as profits, leaving $450,000 in the business, these partners would together pay income taxes of approximately $279,570. But if they should incorporate the business, the total income and capital-stock taxes on the corporation and its three stockholders would, in case the excess-profits tax were repealed, be only $75,865.

One partial substitute for the excess-profits tax would be a tax on the undistributed profits of corporations as nearly as possible equal to the surtax imposed upon the saved income of the individual. If individuals doing business in partnership pay 20 per cent on undistributed profits, individuals doing business through the medium of the corporation should pay 20 per cent. This plan could be applied in many different ways: (1) The distributed profits of the corporation could be substituted for the so-called excess-profits credit of the excess-profits tax and the remaining or taxable profits be taxed at 20 per cent; or (2) a 20 per cent tax on undistributed profits could be applied as a corporation surtax under Title II of the revenue act; or (3) corporations could in form be subjected to the same progressive surtaxes as individuals—a proposal which would prove very advantageous to all corporations with small incomes—with a proviso that the total surtax should never exceed an amount equal to 20 per cent of the undistributed profits.

Of course, the Secretary in the same report advised a reduction of surtaxes so that individuals would not have to pay the high surtaxes.

None of these plans presents any grave administrative difficulty or involves any particular complexity of operation.

If an undistributed profits tax be adopted, it should contain provisions expressly recognizing the various devices by which many corporations find it possible to distribute statutory "dividends," while actually retaining the profits in the business. The object should be to subject stockholders of corporations to the same tax burdens imposed upon the members of a partnership, and any procedure which facilitates the attainment of this object should be welcomed. The stockholders of any corporation should be permitted, for example, by a unanimous vote, to elect to be taxed as the members of a partnership or as the stockholders of a personal-service corporation are now taxed under existing law. It would be advisable seriously to consider the propriety of requiring every corporation, 95 per cent or more of the stock of which is held by one individual, to be treated as a partnership or personal-service corporation. This would go far toward solving the problem whose solution is now vainly sought in section 220 of the revenue act of 1918.

The Secretary goes further and discusses the plan of undistributed profits. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the remainder of that discussion without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The object of these suggestions is to establish so far as possible an exact equivalence between the taxation of corporation stockholders and other taxpayers. The undistributed-profits tax appears to be one practical means of obtaining approximate equality of treatment. This is not only to satisfy a theoretical sense of justice. It is, I believe, the course of practical wisdom. At some points the revenue law as now formulated discriminates unjustifiably against the individual in favor of the corporation. At others it discriminates unduly against corporations in favor of the individual.

These discriminations operate to force many business enterprises into forms of organization not intrinsically the best suited to their needs. Furthermore, the most troublesome problem of income taxation is the same in case of both corporations and unincorporated taxpayers, i. e., the repressive effects of heavy rates when applied to income which is saved and reinvested. That and many other problems of personal and corporation income taxation will best be decided when linked together. We are now taxing reinvested income of individuals at rates which may exceed 70 per cent. The error of this treatment appears plainly when we attempt to apply such rates in the case of corporations. It would be unthinkable to tax the saved income of corporations at 70 per cent. On the other hand, the stockholders of corporations are forced to pay through the corporation a higher normal tax than individuals. They receive no credit against this normal tax for the personal exemptions, and—under existing law—profits which have paid both the corporation income tax and the heavy excess-profits tax are again subjected, when distributed as dividends to stockholders, to surtaxes rising in some cases to 65 per cent. In the latter instances the discrimination is against the corporation and its stockholders. Like treatment should prove in the long run the surest means of obtaining just and wholesome treatment. Separate treatment will in the long run conduce to corporation baiting. If corporations insist upon different treatment, they are in the long run likely to receive worse treatment. The next revision of the tax law should place the income tax upon an enduring foundation of sound principle. Lasting solutions and not temporary makeshifts should be sought.

The tax on undistributed profits has certain obvious disadvantages, as, in fact, have all tax proposals. It is widely opposed because it would, in form, fall on reinvested profits, although the personal-income tax falls also on reinvested profits. It is believed also by many honest and able men that, notwithstanding the fact that it would reduce the tax burden upon corporations, it would tend to cause an undue dissemination of corporation profits and subject directors of corporations to a strong temptation to pay out as dividends profits actually needed in extending or maintaining the business itself.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to another argument, and I desire to read the foreword to this little pamphlet which I suppose every Senator, at least members of the Finance Committee, has received, and I would be glad if every Senator and every Member of the House and everyone in the country could get the benefit of the argument which is presented here. The foreword to this little pamphlet is as follows:

FOREWORD.

"Organized soon after the passage of the first excess profits tax law in October, 1917, the committee on federal taxation of the National Association of Credit Men has continued without change in personnel.

"In its brief filed on June 28, 1918, with the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives (then holding hearings on the revenue act of 1918), and in a hearing before the Finance Committee of the United States Senate on September 12, 1918, the repeal of the 1917 excess profits tax law was urged. Objections to the excess-profits tax provisions of the revenue act of 1918 were also urged in a brief filed with the conference committee of the House and Senate in January, 1919. In August, 1919, in a 'Statement of position' embodying the principles set forth in resolutions adopted by the association at its annual convention at Detroit in June, 1919, the immediate repeal of the excess profits tax law was demanded and it was recommended that the revenue to be raised from income taxes be obtained from a tax on the income of the individual.

"Appreciating the necessity of establishing a plan of taxation which would equitably distribute the burden of the tax on the earnings of industry, the conventions at Chicago and Detroit in 1918 and 1919 had instructed the committee to continue its work. Carrying out these instructions the committee issued in January, 1920, a 'Message on Federal Taxation,' setting forth the principles of the undistributed earnings tax.

"This booklet, together with another issued in March, 1920, entitled 'Income Taxation,' which developed this principle more clearly and more in detail, was submitted to the entire membership of the National Association of Credit Men—33,000 manufacturers, wholesalers, banks, and financial institutions. At the annual convention in Atlantic City in June, 1920, at which were present delegates from all parts of the country, the recommendations of the committee were discussed at length and approved. Since that time there has been much study and discussion of the subject, and, in addition to restating the principles of this tax, the committee now sets forth the reasons for the disapproval of a general sales-tax—a resolution condemning a general sales tax as a method of raising governmental revenue having been passed by the 1920 convention."

Mr. President, this little pamphlet, which is gotten up by the Credit Men's Association, discusses the question of the repeal of the excess-profits tax and advocates its repeal, and discusses the various plans which have been suggested as substitutes for the excess-profits tax. I may add further for it that it is a written document, every word in it has been considered and has been weighed, and the various matters have been tabulated and brought into their very close relationship. It is really a thesis upon this particular subject. Of course, it is much shorter and presents the matter in much more accurate and scientific language than can be done in an offhand presentation, such as I have been making. I ask that the pamphlet may be printed in the RECORD following my remarks, and in 8-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Mexico? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I believe that I have presented the essential features of the situation. I think I have called attention to the very gross injustices which are going to be placed upon the people of the country by the proposal of the Finance Committee which is now under consideration.

While I do not claim perfection for the plan which I have submitted in my amendment, I do believe it meets in great measure some of the objections to the bill now before the Senate. I am sure that the Senate does not desire to do an injustice. I do not believe that it desires to bring about an inequality. But with all the sincerity which I can command, I believe that you are perpetrating on the people of the country the grossest injustice and grossest inequality ever imposed upon the people through a revenue law.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico concerning his amendment. I followed his discussion with very considerable interest. As I understood from his argument, he criticizes the amendment tendered by the committee upon the ground—and it seems to me a very well-taken criticism—that it imposes upon the corporations earning a relatively small profit a burden of taxes equal with the corporation that earns a very high rate of profit. The Senator furnished a table very illuminatingly showing that the operation of the change in the tax plan would be to impose a heavier burden of taxation upon the corporation that pays a small profit and relieves the corporation that earns enormous profits.

As I understood the Senator, he desires a graduated tax so that those corporations which pay relatively high profits will pay a relatively high rate of tax, but I do not understand that the amendment, as the Senator has it, accomplishes that purpose.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to the Senator that that is not the purpose. That is the purpose of an excess-profits tax, and we can not reach that question in any other way. The Senate has decided not to have an excess-profits tax. We can only reach that sort of thing by considering the invested capital of a corporation and dealing with the percentages earned on the invested capital; but the Senate has decided already not to do that very thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, as I understand the Senator, the amendment expresses simply the idea that the undistributed profits should be taxed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That reaches it as near as may be, and that the corporation shall pay no tax for the individual on the distributed earnings or income of the corporation. The purpose is to find some relative way of treating the undistributed earnings of corporations and the taxes which those earnings would pay if distributed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So the sole purpose of the amendment as a whole is to tax the undistributed profits?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; to tax the undistributed profits. I have tried to exemplify the thought as to distributed income of the corporation, that if the corporation pays no tax on it, then it is taxed on an equality with all other incomes; but that leaves to be considered the undistributed income of corporations, and some method must be found to meet that situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is there anything, then, in the amendment which will in any wise relieve the situation which the Senator has so clearly exposed that arises by reason of the flat tax upon all corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Oh, yes. I provide that the corporation shall pay no flat tax at all, and that when the earnings get into the hands of the stockholders as dividends, then the stockholders——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They will then be subject to the usual surtaxes?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; and the normal tax.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that the purpose is to reach the profits of the corporation and compel their distribution so they will go into the hands of individual stockholders, where they will be subject to the usual normal tax and surtax instead of the flat rate?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is the purpose because, as the Senator will realize, if all incomes of corporations were distributed and the corporations paid no flat tax, then the net income would bear the same burden of taxation as incomes from individuals and be placed upon an equality; but inasmuch as corporations do not, and wisely do not, distribute all of their net incomes, we have got to find some means of placing a burden upon that undistributed income akin or equivalent, as nearly as a plan may be devised, to the normal tax and surtax imposed upon the incomes of individuals.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether those distributions, if they were enforced in the manner intended by the Senator, would not in a very large part go into the hands of those who are already exempt from any tax whatever to the Government; that is to say, those whose income is less than $1,000 or between $1,000 and $2,000, so that they would be exempt?

I have in mind the fact that in my own State, for instance, a good many widows and other people of very moderate circumstances have put all their savings—and they would only be a few hundred dollars—say, into a sugar company or some mercantile establishment that has a good reputation, that has been engaged in business for very many years. They draw only from $50 to $200 or $300 per annum dividends upon that stock, and that, plus their other earnings, would not be sufficient to raise them above the $1,000 limit, or, at most, above the $2,000 limit. In my opinion, there would be very many millions of dollars distributed to persons in that situation in life, and such dividends would be free, not only from the surtax but from the normal tax. I am not combating the view that such persons ought not to be taxed, but I am merely suggesting that if the policy favored by the Senator from New Mexico is pursued, if I understand his policy, undoubtedly it would result in an exemption from all taxation of dividends in the hands of a large number of people. The corporations now do pay a very large tax to the Government. So it would result in the Government getting nothing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Utah was not present, or, at any rate, I believe he could not have been present when I discussed that very point.

Mr. KING. Unfortunately, I was twice called from the Chamber while the Senator was speaking.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I know the Senator from Utah is usually here, and a very patient and intelligent listener, too.

My thought is—and what I am arguing for is—that such people as those to whom the Senator refers should not be required to pay any tax, but that whenever we levy a flat tax upon a corporation we are taxing those unfortunates precisely at the same rate as the man who may have $1,000,000 a year income. As to the effect of it, however, that appears in a table which I have asked to have inserted in my remarks. On a supposed distribution of $2,500,000,000 there would be $500,000,000 which would go into the hands of those who would not pay any taxes; and I should like for the Senator in the fullness of his heart to consider the advisability and wisdom of any law which would levy a tax of 15 per cent upon the holdings of those people who would not pay any tax if their interests in the corporations were distributed to them. It is that inequality which I seek to combat. Equality in taxation at this time is desired above all other considerations. We may repeal the excess-profits tax, we may relieve those earning high percentages upon their invested capital, as the Senate has done, by the repeal of the excess-profits tax, but I want to predict that when we do that there will rise from one end of the country to the other a most ardent and heartfelt protest against such an inequality and injustice. At this time, when the country is to be burdened with high taxes, in a time of depression, of all times, there should be justice and equality. The proposal to repeal the excess-profits tax and put a flat tax upon the corporations instead, thereby making the widows and orphans pay as high a rate upon their interest in a corporation as a millionaire, I say is infamous and will not be tolerated by the people of this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator a question? I have followed him as well as I could.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the Senator offered more than one amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have not, but I stated in the beginning of my remarks that I would offer other amendments if the amendment which I have offered was adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have the Senator's amendment before me and I have been looking over it. If I understand the amendment correctly, it provides that every corporation shall be subject to a tax on its net earnings according to 10 different rates; "8 per cent of the first 10 per cent of the amount of the net income," and so on up to 56 per cent; so that small corporations and large corporations will be taxed from 8 per cent up to 56 per cent on their income. Am I correct about that?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state that the Senator probably has not read the language of the amendment which is printed on the back of the sheet he holds in his hand.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had not noticed that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As I have once or twice said, the language of the amendment is that of the expert, and it does convey accurately the idea intended, but it requires a little analysis in order that it may be understood.

I will say to the Senator from Michigan that the purpose of the amendment and its operation would result in this: That there would be a graduated tax upon the undistributed earnings of corporations, the graduations being in steps of 10 per cent of the total income of the corporation.

THE UNDISTRIBUTED EARNINGS TAX—A PLAN TO TAX THE CURRENT YEAR'S EARNINGS OF CORPORATIONS NOT DISTRIBUTED.

[Issued December, 1920. National Association of Credit Men. Committee on Federal taxation: E. H. Jaynes, the Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Co., Cleveland, Ohio; Charles D. Joyce, the A. Colburn Co., Philadelphia, Pa.; W. M. Kennard, Graupner, Love & Lamprecht, New York, N. Y.; S. J. Whitlock, Belding Bros. & Co., Chicago, Ill.; R. G. Elliott, chairman, Jaques Mfg. FOREWORD.

"Organized soon after the passage of the first excess profits tax law in October, 1917, the committee on Federal taxation of the National Association of Credit Men has continued without change in personnel.

"In its brief filed on June 28, 1918, with the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives (then holding hearings on the revenue act of 1918) and in a hearing before the Finance Committee of the United States Senate on September 12, 1918, the repeal of the 1917 excess profits tax law was urged. Objections to the excess-profits tax provisions of the revenue act of 1918 were also urged in a brief filed with the conference committee of the House and Senate in January, 1919. In August, 1919, in a 'Statement of position' embodying the principles set forth in resolutions adopted by the association at its annual convention at Detroit in June, 1919, the immediate repeal of the excess profits tax law was demanded, and it was recommended that the revenue to be raised from income taxes be obtained from a tax on the income of the individual.

"Appreciating the necessity of establishing a plan of taxation which would equitably distribute the burden of the tax on the earnings of industry, the conventions at Chicago and Detroit in 1918 and 1919 had instructed the committee to continue its work. Carrying out these instructions the committee issued in January, 1920, a 'Message on Federal taxation,' setting forth the principles of the undistributed earnings tax.

"This booklet, together with another issued in March, 1920, entitled 'Income Taxation,' which developed this principle more clearly and more in detail, was submitted to the entire membership of the National Association of Credit Men—33,000 manufacturers, wholesalers, banks, and financial institutions. At the annual convention in Atlantic City in June, 1920, at which were present delegates from all parts of the country, the recommendations of the committee were discussed at length and approved. Since that time there has been much study and discussion of the subject, and, in addition to restating the principles of this tax, the committee now sets forth the reasons for the disapproval of a general sales tax—a resolution condemning a general sales tax as a method of raising governmental revenue having been passed by the 1920 convention.

SUMMARY.

"The recommendations of the National Association of Credit Men presented by the committee on Federal taxation are:

"1. Elimination of the excess-profits tax.

"2. Elimination of the corporation-income tax.

"3. Dividends from current earnings to be subject to the normal tax in the hands of the individual.

"4. Substitution of a corporation undistributed earnings tax at graduated rates.

"5. Dividends which are paid from earnings of prior years on which the corporation has paid the undistributed earnings tax, not to be considered as income to the individual shareholder. Dividends may not be paid from surplus until earnings of current year have first been used for that purpose.

"6. Adjustment of rates of taxation on personal incomes (both normal and surtax) to meet the requirements of the budget.

"The following summary contains the committee's arguments and views on income taxation, which have resulted in the formulation of the above recommendations and of the rejection of other proposed tax measures. They are here stated simply and briefly. The elaboration of the points here made may be found in the body of the argument.

PRINCIPLES OF TAXATION.

"1. Taxes should be certain, not arbitrary. The taxpayer should know just what taxes he has to pay, and when and how he has to pay them.

"2. Taxes should be convenient both as to time and manner of payment. The taxpayer should not be taxed at a time or in a manner that will prove inconvenient or disruptive to his business or activities.

"3. The expense of collecting taxes should be as low as possible and taxes should be so levied as to interfere as little as possible with the industrial activities of the Nation.

"4. The people of the Nation should contribute to the support of their Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective ability to pay taxes.

"5. Ability to pay taxes increases more rapidly than in direct proportion to the increase in the net income. The family with an income of $30,000 has somewhat more than ten times the ability to pay taxes that the family with an income of $3,000 has. This principle of progressive income taxation is recognized in the United States and other countries.

WHO PAYS TAXES.

"6. The individual, in the last analysis, pays the taxes. Whatever tax is levied is finally paid by some individual.

"7. Since corporations are only aggregations of individuals, the tax on corporations falls on the individuals comprising the corporations.

"8. Tax measures that fail to recognize the individual as the tax-bearing unit open the way to discrimination between individuals.

"9. Only by taxing individuals on their personal income can justice in income taxation be secured.

THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"10. The excess-profits tax discriminates against business of a hazardous character and in favor of business of a stable character.

"11. It discriminates against conservatively organized and capitalized business and in favor of business loosely capitalized.

"12. It discriminates between corporations on the one hand and partnerhips and individuals on the other.

"13. It discriminates against the small shareholder whom it penalizes severely in violation of the principle of ability to pay.

"14. It exercises a repressive effect on industry and curbs production and discourages initiative.

"15. It makes for inflation and extravagance.

"16. It is steadily diminishing in productivity.

"17. It is difficult, if not impossible, of administration.

"For the above reasons the excess-profits tax should be repealed.

A TAX ON UNDISTRIBUTED EARNINGS OF CORPORATIONS.

"18. A tax to take the place of the excess-profits tax should raise the revenue necessitated by the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

"19. A substitute for the excess-profits tax must tax individuals on their individual income substantially in accordance with their ability to pay.

"20. Income taxation under the present law taxes all individuals who are not corporate shareholders as individuals, and on their ability to pay. The extension of this principle to apply to corporate shareholders will substantially equalize the tax for all individuals.

"21. Individuals who are not corporate shareholders are now taxed on their total earnings from all sources, whether distributed or not distributed; whereas corporate shareholders (if the excess-profits tax and corporation income tax are repealed) will be taxed only on the earnings received by them. The undistributed earnings of corporations would thus be untaxed.

"22. By taxing the undistributed earnings of corporations at a rate comparable to the normal and surtax rates paid by individuals and partners and other individuals who are not shareholders of corporations, substantial equality will be achieved as between all forms of business and all groups of individuals.

"Such a tax is therefore recommended.

OTHER PROPOSED SUBSTITUTES FOR THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"(a) A tax (at a suggested rate of 1 per cent) on every sale or turnover of commodities and services, real property, capital assets, rent, and interest.

"(b) A tax (at a suggested rate of 1 per cent) on every sale or turnover of goods, wares, and merchandise (limited to commodities).

"(c) A tax on all final sales of goods, wares, and merchandise for consumption or use.

THE GENERAL SALES TAX.

"The objections to the general sales tax are:

"23. The word "sale" is difficult of definition.

"24. The administration of a general sales tax involves the setting up of new tax machinery.

"25. If the sales tax is shifted to the consumer it violates the principle of taxation in accordance with ability to pay.

"26. If borne by the seller and not shifted it discriminates against businesses that have large sales with a small rate of profit compared with sales.

"27. If only partially shifted it involves injustices to both seller and consumer.

"28. It discriminates against individual businesses and in favor of integrated business that carries on several processes of manufacture and distribution.

A TAX ON FINAL SALES FOR CONSUMPTION OR USE.

"29. It is difficult to determine whether a sale is made for final consumption or use.

"30. It is difficult of administration.

"31. When borne by the final seller it discriminates unfairly in favor of businesses with small total sales and a high rate of profit, and against businesses with large total sales and a low rate of profit.

"32. When borne by the retailer it imposes the sole tax burden upon him.

"33. When borne by the consumer it violates the principle of taxation in accordance with ability to pay.

WHO PAYS THE TAXES?

"All of the property of the country is owned either by or for the individuals of the country, either in their own right or through governmental, corporate, and partnership holdings and therefore they either receive or own all the income of the country. These same individuals in the last analysis pay all the taxes. No matter what manner of tax is levied, be it a tax on property, property transfers, corporate profits, luxuries, general sales, or individual incomes, it must finally be paid out of the income of some individual whether received by him or accrued for his benefit.

CORPORATIONS AS SOURCES FOR TAXATION.

"The relation of taxation to the income of the individual is obscured by various kinds of indirect taxation. The taxing of corporate incomes is a case in point. In the treatment of a corporation as a separate entity for the purposes of taxation (or business), the real character of a corporation is lost sight of and the relation of the individual shareholder to the tax is ignored. By such treatment corporations have come to be considered distinct from the true owners, the individual shareholders, and the profits and taxes of corporations something apart and distinct from the profits and taxes of these owners. Such, however, is not the case.

WHAT IS A CORPORATION?

"The Supreme Court of the United States has said that 'an incorporated company is an association of individuals, acting as a single person and by their corporate name'; and again:

"'Private corporations are but associations of individuals united for some common purpose, and permitted by the law to use a common name, and to change their members without dissolution of the association.' U. S. v. Trinidad Coal Co., 137 U. S., 160 (1890).

"A corporation is made up of a group of individuals who organize in this form for the purpose of carrying on more conveniently some form of business.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF STOCK AND OWNERSHIP IN A CORPORATION.

"Capital is necessary for carrying on business or trade. If the men who organize a corporation have not money enough of their own to finance the business, they sell a share in the business to others, which share in the business is represented by stock in the corporation. By this process the stock and hence the ownership in a corporation is often widely distributed. The Pennsylvania Railroad, for example, is owned by more than 100,000 people, and the average investment of these 100,000 people is about $5,000. The United States Steel Corporation is another example of widely distributed ownership. It is owned by 75,000 people who have an average investment of about $7,000. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. is owned by more than 100,000 people, whose average investment is about $4,000. A small number of the shareholders in these companies have, it is true, very large investments, but it is equally true that there are thousands who own but a few hundred dollars worth. These examples, which are typical, show conclusively that when we speak of a corporation we are really speaking of a group of individuals who are the true owners of the corporation, each one of whom has an undivided interest in the property of the corporation. This corporation belongs to these individuals and the earnings of it are their earnings, and belong to them just as the earnings of the corner grocery belongs to John Smith who owns and runs it, or as the earnings of the wage earner belongs to him.

CORPORATE TAXES ARE INDIVIDUAL TAXES.

"When the corporation is taxed the individuals who own it are taxed. A tax on corporate earnings is a tax on individual earnings at a uniform rate. Taxing the corporate earnings at 30 per cent means, therefore, taxing the earnings of each individual in the business at 30 per cent, regardless of whether the individual's share of the earnings is $1,000 or $100,000, and regardless of his total income from all sources. Taxing a corporation taxes the incomes of individuals proportionately, not progressively, and hence without due regard to their ability to pay.

"The principle of taxing in accordance with ability to pay can be applied successfully only by taxing directly each individual on his earnings, whether actually received or earned and held for him and undistributed to him.

THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX—ITS ORIGIN.

"The present excess-profits tax on corporations was designed by Congress to reach particularly those of wealth and large incomes. Corporations have been regarded as representing wealth. In the aggregate they do represent wealth in their entirety, because they hold much property and receive profits which, even though small in percentage, are large in amount. Corporations, however, are only aggregations of individuals. The taxes of the corporations are the taxes of the shareholders. They may be few, they may be many; they may be comparatively poor, they may be comparatively rich. By the very nature of a corporation the excess-profits tax falls not only on a few people of great wealth and income but upon many shareholders of only moderate income and wealth. It fails, therefore, of accomplishing the very purpose for which it was designed.

THE DIFFICULTY OF DEFINITION—WHAT ARE EXCESS PROFITS?

"The so-called excess-profits tax is predicated on the principle that all profits over and above 8 per cent on invested capital are inordinate or excessive profits. It makes no distinction as to the nature of the business. It simply assumes that business is business and that a fair return on capital in one enterprise is a fair return on capital in another enterprise. Such a definition is wholly inadequate and unjust.

"Granting that 8 per cent is a fair return on capital invested in a given line—for example, in a trade dealing in staples which are strictly necessities for which there is a steady, uninterrupted demand, not subject to wide fluctuation, and with a record of many years of steady prosperity—is it reasonable to say that the same return—8 per cent on capital—is fair and will attract capital to a hazardous business or one in which the element of uncertainty is ever present, such as developing an invention or a new and unknown product or process?

"Most of our great inventions never would have been developed if they had been dependent for capital on an 8 per cent return with no compensation promised for the losses and only minor interest in the profits over the 8 per cent.

"The country has grown to be what it is to-day because its citizens were courageous and were willing to back new enterprises and enter new fields—to put their capital at building or developing something new and untried in the hope of extra returns.

"If this return is to be denied them, they will not venture into these hazardous enterprises, and the country as a whole will suffer by this lack of development.

"However desirable and sound the principle of an excess-profits tax may be in principle, the difficulties of definition render its application impracticable and unfair. An excess-profits tax which fails to distinguish between various lines of business by that very fact discriminates against certain businesses and in favor of certain others. Such a discrimination is detrimental to business as a whole, and the tax which thus discriminates is justly open to attack.

THE BASIS FOR CALCULATING THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX—INVESTED CAPITAL IN ITS RELATION TO THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"But the excess-profits tax is to be condemned not only because by defining as excess profits everything above 8 per cent it discriminates between various lines of business. The basis upon which this tax is levied on the earnings of a corporation opens the door to discriminations of a far more serious character, since they affect not only different lines of business but also competing businesses in the same line.

"The basis for calculating the excess-profits tax is invested capital. The excess-profits tax is a tax at a graduated rate of 20 per cent on the earnings above 8 per cent on what is termed 'invested capital' and 40 per cent on all earnings above 20 per cent on this invested capital. Then there is in addition a flat income tax on what is left of the earnings. Since the rate of tax and exemption is dependent upon invested capital, the method of computing this invested capital is of primary importance. A computation of invested capital that applies fairly to all business is a prerequisite to the fair administration of this tax. Unfortunately a uniform method of computing invested capital is almost impossible of definition, because from its very nature invested capital must reflect every element peculiar to the individual business. Invested capital, for example, is not always computed on the present value of the assets of the business, but on what may have been paid for it, possibly many years ago, and without regard to the fact that large sums may have been spent in developing the value of the property. The inequities that result from the application of any general rule of computation of invested capital are legion.

"Col. Robert H. Montgomery, formerly president of the American Association of Public Accountants, says in his book on excess-profits tax procedure, page 107:

"No excess-profits tax based on 'capital' will ever work equitably unless some one is able to define capital and then require all taxpayers to apply the definition simultaneously and uniformly."

"The present excess-profits tax does not define capital in any way that permits of simultaneous and uniform application.

INEQUITIES OF THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"The inequities of this excess-profits tax, which is a tax on corporations and which defines excess profits as profits above 8 per cent on invested capital, can be best shown by illustrations. These inequities fall into four groups:

"1. Discrimination between different lines of business.

"2. Discrimination between business in the same line.

"3. Discrimination between individuals in different lines of business and individuals in the same line of business, which results from 1 and 2.

"4. Discrimination between individuals in the same business.

DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN DIFFERENT LINES OF BUSINESS.

"As a result of the defining of excess profits as profits above 8 per cent there is a discrimination in favor of business enterprises that deal in staples or necessities and against enterprises of a hazardous character. This discrimination has been discussed previously, and it is so self-evident as to require no specific illustrations.

DISCRIMINATIONS ATTRIBUTABLE TO THE INTERPRETATION OF INVESTED CAPITAL.

"The discriminations attributable to the interpretation of invested capital can be exemplified by the following illustration of the Jones Grocery Co. and the Harris Shoe Co. Both businesses have the same capital invested in the business of $500,000 and both businesses have the same net income of $100,000. In justice therefore both businesses should contribute the same amount of taxes to the Government, but the Harris Shoe Co. which is so organized, or whose books have been so kept that their capital accounts reflect the full value of their assets, and that their invested capital is the same as the value of their assets, actually paid $12,600 less in taxes than the Jones Grocery Co.

NOTE.—These computations have been verified by Lybrand, Ross Bros. & Montgomery, certified public accountants, New York, N. Y.

"This shows a difference in tax of $12,600 based on a business with the same assets and the same net income.

"This tremendous difference is due to the fact that invested capital under the present law does not always mean the money invested in the business. It frequently means something very much less than the actual investment.

"The allowance of an exemption of 8 per cent on invested capital (as defined by the law) results in an actual exemption of anywhere from 2 per cent to 8 per cent on the money invested in the business, dependent upon the question of whether or not the company's capital accounts have been so kept as to reflect fully the value of its assets.

"The rate of tax—or the bracket under which the corporation's income is taxed—is also dependent upon the invested capital. Thus there is a difference in tax in favor of the Harris Shoe Co. of $12,600. The exemption of the Jones Grocery Co. is 4 per cent on the money invested in the business. The exemption of the Harris Shoe Co. is 8 per cent. Fifty thousand dollars of the net income of the Jones Grocery Co. is taxed at 40 per cent; none of the income of the Harris Shoe Co. comes under the 40 per cent rate. The total tax paid by the Jones Grocery Co. is 32.66 per cent of the net income. The total tax paid by the Harris Shoe Co. is 20.06 per cent of the net income.

"As a result of this discrimination, which is possible by the interpretation of invested capital, the Jones Grocery Co. paid the Government $12,600 more than the Harris Shoe Co. It is obvious from these figures that the Jones Grocery Co. can not compete on equal terms with the Harris Shoe Co. for money, material, and labor.

DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN THE SAME LINES OF BUSINESS.

"The discrimination in favor of the Harris Shoe Co., though greatly to be condemned, may not be disastrous to the Jones Grocery Co. since they are not in the same line of business. Such a discrimination is more serious if the Jones Grocery Co. and the Harris Shoe Co. are in the same line of business. And they may well be in the same line of business. In that event the Harris Shoe Co. is tremendously favored by an interpretation of invested capital which makes them pay $12,600 less than the Jones Grocery Co., whose assets are the same as theirs and whose income is exactly the same. If, in addition, the Jones Grocery Co. and the Harris Shoe Co., both wholesale grocers, are competing in the same community, the discrimination in favor of the Harris Shoe Co. is likely to result disastrously for the Jones Grocery Co.

DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN INDIVIDUALS IN VARIOUS LINES OF BUSINESS AND IN DIFFERENT BUSINESSES OF THE SAME LINE.

"As a natural result of the discriminations outlined above, the shareholders of the Jones Grocery Co. and the Harris Shoe Co. are unequally treated.

"The definition of invested capital makes possible other discriminations of a character at least as serious as that illustrated in the case of the Jones Grocery Co. and the Harris Shoe Co. A common and notable example is the discrimination that may result between the owners of an old-established business built up by them and the purchasers of a business already developed, a discrimination again due to the fact that the money invested in the business is not the equivalent of invested capital.

ILLUSTRATION OF DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN OWNERS OF AN OLD-ESTABLISHED BUSINESS AND PURCHASERS OF A BUSINESS ALREADY DEVELOPED.

"Take, as an example, two companies organized in 1900, each with $100,000 capital, all in the same line of business, 'A' a producer of raw material and 'B' a manufacturer using this material. Assume that they prospered equally, and in 1916 the surplus of each, created by undistributed earnings, amounted to $50,000. The capital and surplus of each of the companies was $150,000; of the two companies combined, $300,000. They each had assets worth much more than the amount of their capital and surplus, created in the following manner:

"'A' bought in 1900 a tract of land for $50,000, on which he located a mine. Owing to the increasing demand for the product of the mine, its value has gradually advanced until in 1916 the value of the assets of 'A's' business was $500,000.

"'B,' the manufacturer of an article of general consumption, put out under his special brand, expended several hundred thousand dollars in publicity and introductory work, and being ultraconservative in his accounting methods and not requiring credit, this created value was not reflected in his capital accounts; the value of his trade brand was not carried on his books notwithstanding the fact that in 1916 the total assets of the business had a value of $500,000 against capital and surplus of $150,000.

"In 1916 'C' formed a new company with one million paid-in capital and bought for cash the business of 'A' and 'B,' paying each $500,000 for their respective businesses. 'C' earned 15 per cent on his capital each year, or $150,000 in 1917, 1918, and 1919. For 1919 his tax would be computed as follows:

Invested capital		$1,000,000
Net income	$150,000
Less:
Exemption, 8 per cent, on invested capital	$80,000
Specific exemption	3,000
	83,000
Taxable income	67,000
Tax.
(Taxable income is less than 20 per cent on invested capital, so is taxable at 20 per cent.)
20 per cent on $67,000—
Total excess-profits tax		$13,400
Income tax.
Net income	$150,000
Less:
Excess-profits tax	$13,400
Exemption	2,000
	15,400
Taxable at 10 per cent	134,600	13,460
Total income and excess-profits tax		26,860

"Had 'A' and 'B' continued their business instead of selling to 'C,' and assuming that a consolidated return was in order, the consolidated tax would have been as follows:

Invested capital for both		$300,000
Net income for both	$150,000
Less:
Exemption 8 per cent on invested capital	$24,000
Specific	3,000
Taxable income	123,000
Tax.
20 per cent of invested capital	60,000
Less exemptions	27,000
Taxable at 20 per cent	33,000	6,600
Net income over 20 per cent on invested capital and taxable at 40 per cent	90,000	36,000
Total excess-profits tax		42,600
Income tax.
Net income	150,000
Less excess-profits tax	$42,600
Exemption	2,000
	44,600
Taxable at 10 per cent	105,400	10,540
Total income and excess-profits tax		53,140

"The same business with the same earnings and the same assets would have paid, if in the hands of the original owners, A and B, $53,140, assuming affiliation.

"It paid in the hands of C $26,860.

"A result of such discriminations is a temptation on the part of an established business making substantial profits to enter new lines or related lines, using the losses in the new line of business to reduce its taxes in the regular line.

"Again, we may see from the example cited a discrimination that affects various lines of business, businesses in the same line, and individuals both in various lines of business and in the same line of business.

DISCRIMINATIONS AS BETWEEN CORPORATIONS ON THE ONE HAND AND INDIVIDUALS AND PARTNERSHIPS ON THE OTHER.

"Because individuals and partnerships in business are taxed under one tax and corporations under another there results a discrimination between individuals and partnerships on the one hand and corporations on the other. The following illustration will make clear this discrimination.

"Adams, Brown, and Chapin, wholesale manufacturers of clothing, are members of a partnership. Anson, Barrett, and Crawford are shareholders in a wholesale grocery corporation. The partnership and the corporation earn the same net income of $100,000, but the partnership pays in taxes only $19,200, whereas the corporation pays in taxes $35,608.

"Adams, Brown, and Chapin are members of a partnership. Adams owns 3 per cent interest, Brown owns 30 per cent, Chapin owns 67 per cent. The partnership has a net income of $100,000, which it distributes. Then Adams, Brown, and Chapin pay taxes as follows:

	Adams.	Brown.	Chapin.
Income	$3,000	$30,000	$67,000
Tax	40	3,890	15,270
Per cent of tax	[1] 1.33	[1] 13	[1] 22.8

"Anson, Barrett, and Crawford are shareholders with the same percentage of holdings in a corporation which earns the same income of $100,000, all of which is distributed after paying 30 per cent excess-profits tax. Then Anson, Barrett, and Crawford pay taxes as follows:

	Anson.	Barrett.	Crawford.
Share of income before 30 per cent tax is paid	$3,000	$30,000	$67,000
Income distributed after tax is paid	2,100	21,000	46,900
Excess-profits tax borne by each	900	9,000	20,100
Personal income tax on distributed earnings		800	4,808
Total tax	900	9,800	24,908
Per cent of tax	[1] 30	[1] 32.66	[1] 37.17

[1] These computations have been verified by Lybrand, Ross Bros. & Montgomery, certified public accountants, New York, N. Y.

"The inequity as between the partnership and the corporation which results in the payment by the corporation of $16,408 more than the partnership pays in taxes is revealed in a more startling fashion by a comparison of the payment of the various members in the partnership and the corporation. The members of the partnership and the shareholders in the corporation each have the same income, and should naturally have the same taxes, but Adams, of the partnership, with an income of $3,000, pays in taxes only $40, whereas, Anson, a shareholder in the corporation, whose share of the corporate income is also $3,000, is subject to a tax of $900, paid for him by the corporation.

"Brown, of the partnership, whose income is $30,000, pays a tax of $3,890.

"Barrett, of the corporation, whose share of the corporate income is also $30,000, is subject to a tax of $9,800, paid for him by the corporation.

"Chapin, of the partnership, whose income is $67,000, pays a tax of $15,270.

"Crawford, of the corporation, whose share of the corporate income is also $67,000, is subject to a tax of $24,908, paid for him by the corporation.

"The figures of the Adams, Brown, and Chapin partnership, wholesale clothiers, and of Anson, Barrett, and Crawford, of the corporation, wholesale grocers, are equally applicable to Adams, Brown, and Chapin and Anson, Barrett, and Crawford as competitors in the same line of business. There is, therefore, as a result of these two methods of taxation a gross discrimination between various lines of business, between businesses in the same line, and between individuals in the same and different lines of business.

"NOTE.—If the individuals in the partnership have other sources of income which would make them subject to the higher rates of surtaxes, the discrimination may be actually the reverse, i. e., against the partnership and in favor of the corporation.

DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN INDIVIDUALS IN THE SAME BUSINESS—THE PENALIZATION OF A SMALL SHAREHOLDER.

"The excess-profits tax adds to these three types of discrimination already exemplified one other, namely, discrimination between individuals in the same business. This last discrimination works a gross injustice to the small shareholder. The table illustrating the discrimination between the partnership and the corporation will serve also to illustrate this injustice:

"Adams, Brown, and Chapin are members of a partnership. Adams owns 3 per cent interest, Brown owns 30 per cent, Chapin owns 67 per cent. The partnership has a net income of $100,000, which it distributes. Then Adams, Brown, and Chapin pay taxes as follows:

	Adams.	Brown.	Chapin.
Income	$3,000	$30,000	$67,000
Tax	40	3,890	15,270
Per cent of tax	[1] 1.33	[1] 13	[1] 22.8

"Anson, Barrett, and Crawford are shareholders with the same percentage of holdings in a corporation, which earns the same income of $100,000, all of which is distributed after paying 30 per cent excess-profits tax. Then Anson, Barrett, and Crawford pay taxes as follows:

	Anson.	Barrett.	Crawford.
Share of income before 30 per cent tax is paid	$3,000	$30,000	$67,000
Income distributed after tax is paid	2,100	21,000	46,900
Excess profits tax borne by each	900	9,000	20,100
Personal income tax on distributed earnings		800	4,808
Total tax	900	9,800	24,908
Per cent of tax	[1] 30	[1] 32.66	[1] 37.17

"Anson's share of income from his investment in the corporation is $3,000. Nine hundred dollars of this, which is 30 per cent, is turned over to the Government. If Anson had his money in a partnership, he would pay but $40, or 1.33 per cent of his income, since he would be allowed an exemption of $2,000 and pay but 4 per cent on the remaining $1,000, or $40. Such an inequity, a tax of 4 per cent on $1,000 as against a tax of 90 per cent on $1,000, works a tremendous hardship. The case of Anson may be an extreme case, but the discrimination against the small shareholder exists, no matter what figures are used. This discrimination constitutes the greatest violation of the foremost principle of income taxation, namely, levying taxes in accordance with ability to pay. While the corporation may have the ability to pay the excess profits of 30 per cent in the case of Anson, Barrett, and Crawford, Anson, the individual shareholder in that corporation, has not the ability to stand a tax of 30 per cent of his earnings or a tax of 90 per cent on the amount above that needed for the bare necessities of life.

CONCLUSION.

"Illustrations similar to those given above may be greatly multiplied. Those already given are sufficient to show conclusively that the excess-profits tax on corporations discriminates—

"1. Against business of a hazardous character and in favor of business of a stable character—by defining profits above 8 per cent as excess profits.

"2. Against conservatively organized and capitalized business and in favor of business loosely capitalized—by the interpretation of invested capital.

"3. Between corporations on the one hand and partnerships and individuals on the other—by virtue of its being a tax on corporations only.

"4. Against the small shareholder whom it penalizes severely in violation of the principle of ability to pay—by virtue of its being a tax on corporations.

"These discriminations affect business enterprises in different lines, competing enterprises in the same lines, individuals in the same and different lines of business, and finally individuals in the same business.

THE EFFECT OF THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX ON INDUSTRY.

"The effect of the excess-profits tax on industry is wholly capricious. On the one hand it represses initiative and curbs production; on the other hand it makes for inflation and wild extravagance. The existence at the same time of these two diametrically opposite effects constitutes one of the most damning indictments of the tax. If either one of these two baneful effects of the tax existed to the exclusion of the other, the dire effect, being all in one direction, might be more or less calculable and some remedy might conceivably be applied within the tax itself. But to adjust this tax so as to release initiative and at the same time to curb extravagance is an impossibility. The contradictory effects of this tax inhere in the tax itself, and no relief from these effects can be found, save in a different tax. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1919 is particularly illuminating on this point:

"Still more objectionable is the operation of the excess-profits tax in peace times. It encourages wasteful expenditure, puts a premium on overcapitalization and a penalty on brains, energy, and enterprise, discourages new ventures, and confirms old ventures in their monopolies."

THE DIMINISHING PRODUCTIVITY OF THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"The excess-profits tax at first produced a large amount of revenue, but it is rapidly losing whatever virtue in this respect it ever possessed. During the war under the compelling force of patriotism, business men, though conscious of the injustices of this tax, withheld criticism and bore its inequities with a commendable complacency. But with the return to peace the reasons for withholding criticism are removed. The tax is no longer felt as a necessary evil. With every day that the tax remains on the statute books the protest against it increases in strength. Since the tax itself does not permit of equal distribution of the burden of taxation, attempts are increasingly made to avoid and even to evade the injustices that arise from its unfair discriminations. Such attempts, whether made in good faith or not, have a disastrous effect both on the tax and on the taxpayer. They reduce the productivity of the tax and open the way for the demoralization of the taxpayer. A bad tax can not be productive in the long run in a democratic country.

DIFFICULTY AND IMPOSSIBILITY OF ADMINISTRATION.

"The difficulties of administering the excess-profits tax constitute one more proof, if one were needed, of the utter unworkability of this tax. There is an old adage that runs 'good taxation is one-tenth law and nine-tenths administration.' It is common knowledge that the administration of this tax has broken down. Many of the reports of 1917 have not yet been finally closed. The taxpayer never knows when he is through. The resultant uncertainty puts a heavy burden on business and industry. The barriers to a proper administration are apparently insuperable, and every year that the tax remains on the statute book will aggravate the already serious difficulties.

REPEAL THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"For the reasons given above, which are here briefly recapitulated, the repeal of the excess-profits tax is demanded:

"1. It violates the principle of taxation in accordance with the ability to pay.

"2. It discriminates between business enterprises in different lines, competing enterprises in the same line, individuals in the same and different lines, and finally individuals in the same business.

"3. It discriminates against business of a hazardous character and in favor of business of a stable character.

"4. It discriminates against conservatively organized and capitalized business and in favor of loosely organized and capitalized business.

"5. It discriminates between corporations on the one hand and partnerships and individuals on the other.

"6. It exercises a repressive effect on industry and curbs production and discourages initiative.

"7. It makes for inflation and extravagance.

"8. It is steadily diminishing in productivity.

"9. It is difficult, if not impossible, of administration.

A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

"The repeal of the excess-profits tax will necessitate the passing of a new tax measure. This new measure should meet two requirements: 1. It should raise a substantial portion of the revenue formerly derived from the excess-profits tax. 2. It should approximate closely an equal distribution of the tax burden.

"Merely to repeal the excess-profits tax in the hope of abolishing the gross inequities that have resulted from it is not sufficient. In addition to causing a serious loss in revenue, abolishing this tax without providing a satisfactory substitute would, at the same time that it eliminated gross injustices, introduce others. The excess-profits tax, with all its evils, was at least an attempt to equalize the surtaxes paid by sole proprietors and partners on the one hand and the taxes paid by the corporations and borne by the corporate shareholders on the other. The repeal of this tax by freeing the corporate shareholders from a large share of their taxes would discriminate unfairly against the sole proprietors and the partners who are subject to surtaxes. A substitute tax measure must, therefore, be enacted that will insure substantial equality as between individuals in all groups—individuals not in business, individuals in sole proprietorships, individuals in partnerships, and individuals in corporations.

THE INDIVIDUAL MUST BE THE TAXPAYING UNIT.

"In order to achieve this equality the individual must be the taxpaying unit. It is only the individual that has real ability to pay. Therefore it is only by measuring ability to pay where it actually exists, namely, with the individual that a fair tax system can be established.

TAXING INDIVIDUAL INCOME IN ACCORDANCE WITH ABILITY TO PAY.

"Such a tax system—one that taxes individual income on ability to pay—is now in operation for a large number of individuals. Individuals in single proprietorships, individuals in partnerships, and individuals not in business who derive their income from sources other than corporations; in fact, all individuals in the business, professional, salary, or wage-earning groups who are not corporate shareholders are now taxed as individuals on their individual income and on the principle of their ability to pay. Equality of taxation exists, therefore, as between the individuals in all these different groups. Extending to the individual shareholders of corporations, this principle of taxing the individual income in accordance with ability to pay would therefore equalize taxation as between all the individuals of the country.

APPLYING THIS PRINCIPLE TO THE INCOME OF CORPORATE SHAREHOLDERS.

"Under the present law a tax at approximately the full normal rate on individual income is levied on the net income of corporations, and the shareholders are then exempted from the normal tax on the dividends they receive. This flat-rate income tax on corporate net income, however, violates the principle of taxing the individual in accordance with ability to pay. Taxing as it does all shareholders alike, it penalizes the small shareholder whose entire income from all sources may be so small as to be wholly exempt from tax, or to be subject to only the half rate of normal tax. He is compelled to pay the full normal rate upon that part of his income which he receives from dividends (the distributed corporate earnings). It is therefore recommended that each individual shareholder pay his own normal tax upon dividends instead of having it withheld and paid by the corporation.

"With the elimination of the corporate income tax, equality of taxation with regard to distributed earnings is achieved as between corporate shareholders, sole proprietors, and partners.

THE POSSIBILITY OF EXTENDING THIS PRINCIPLE.

"If corporate earnings were all distributed, the individual shareholders would then be taxed just as sole proprietors and partners and all individuals who are not corporate shareholders are taxed. All these groups are taxed on their total earnings. But all the income of corporations is not distributed. Industry has always financed a part of its growth through retention of a portion of its earnings as working capital, and this practice which is dictated by sound business judgment should not be relinquished. To tax corporate shareholders only on the earnings of their investments actually received by them, and to tax individuals who are not corporate shareholders on their total earnings, is obviously an unfair discrimination in favor of the corporate shareholders. There are theoretically three possible ways of equalizing the tax as between these groups of individuals:

"1. To exempt from taxation such income of individuals who are not corporate shareholders as is reinvested, which would be the equivalent of exempting undistributed earnings of corporations reinvested in the business.

"2. To tax shareholders of corporations on the full earnings of their investments whether or not they are distributed to them, thus taxing the shareholders on their full earnings exactly as other individuals are taxed.

"3. To tax the undistributed income of corporations in order to equalize the tax borne by the corporate shareholders with that borne by other individuals.

"However desirable the total exemption of saved or reinvested income of individuals who are not corporate shareholders is in theory, such an exemption is at present impracticable. It would cause a considerable reduction in the Government's revenue and can not therefore be seriously entertained at this time.

"The second possibility, that of taxing shareholders on the full earnings, distributed and undistributed, of their investments, meets with many difficulties. The decision in the United States Supreme Court in the case of Eisner v. Macomber (252 U. S., 180), holding that stock dividends can not be made taxable to the shareholders as income, as well as other practical difficulties, utterly preclude this possibility.

TAXING THE UNDISTRIBUTED EARNINGS OF CORPORATIONS.

"There remains only the alternative of taxing the saved income of the corporate shareholder (which is the current net income of the corporation which remains undistributed) at rates substantially equivalent to those that would be applied if this income were assessable in the hands of the shareholder. We have under the present law the individual paying a tax on his total income, the partner paying on his total income, whether distributed to him or not, and the corporate shareholder paying on the income actually received—all at the same rate—and under the proposed law the corporate shareholder having paid for him a tax on the income undistributed to him at substantially the rate that would apply to this income if it were distributed to him. It is therefore recommended that a graduated tax at rates comparable with the normal and surtax rates paid by individuals and partners on the earnings of their business which are reinvested or remain undistributed should be paid by corporations upon the current net income not distributed in dividends or made subject in the hands of the shareholders to the individual income tax.

OPTIONS WHICH WOULD EQUALIZE THE TAX BURDEN.

"Coupled with the above there should be an option which would permit corporation shareholders by unanimous agreement to elect to pay taxes as partners do or just the same as partners pay, namely, on all the earnings of the business whether distributed or not. When they so elected, the corporation, of course, would not be subject to the undistributed earnings tax because the individual shareholders would have paid their tax on all of the earnings irrespective of whether they have been withdrawn from the business or not, and under this provision they would have placed themselves on a basis of absolute equality with sole traders or partners enjoying the same measure of prosperity.

"If an option of this sort were provided, it would mean absolute equality for all that large class of individuals engaged in business in corporate form, in corporations which are closely held, and it is safe to say that the volume of such business is a substantial portion of the country's turnover.

"There are other plans which might serve the same end and which, while they should not be made mandatory, would be highly beneficial in accomplishing equality if corporations were permitted to avail themselves of same.

CONSTRUCTIVE DISTRIBUTION.

"Prominent among such possible equalizing options is that of constructive distribution or the payment of dividends in interest-bearing obligations of the corporation, such scrip dividends to be considered as taxable income in the hands of the individual shareholder. When current earnings are paid out in this form earnings would not be subjected to the undistributed-earnings tax in the hands of the corporation for the very obvious reason that these earnings are bearing their just tax burden in the hands of the individual shareholder.

"The payment of dividends in scrip is not new. A number of corporations have been paying dividends in this form for many years, and while the committee does not recommend that corporations be forced to pay dividends in this form, it does most strongly recommend for the consideration of the tax legislators that a provision of this sort be made and the use of it be optional in the hands of the corporation.

"From the Government's standpoint, such an option should be in accord with the intent of Congress to obtain equality to the greatest possible degree, for in no case can such a provision be used as a device to avoid just tax liability; because when it is availed of the shareholders of such a corporation will be in a position of absolute equality with other individuals enjoying the same measure of prosperity.

"Either of the above-mentioned plans will permit of absolute equality for all of the shareholders in the smaller business units and for certain other corporate shareholders, as compared with individuals carrying on business as sole traders or in partnerships.

THE NECESSITY OF CONSIDERING THE INDIVIDUAL AS THE TAX-BEARING UNIT.

"Each individual, irrespective of the nature of his investment or source of his income, should pay the same amount of tax as every other individual enjoying the same measure of prosperity. To accomplish this he should be permitted, in so far as possible, to pay his own taxes rather than have them withheld at the source or paid in his behalf by some one else.

"In other words, the Government should abandon, as far as possible, the taxation of individuals en masse, for such taxation is productive of inequities.

"The reason why a tax on undistributed corporate net income is necessary is because the taxing of shareholders direct on these undistributed earnings seems to be legally and physically impossible, as heretofore pointed out.

WHY UNDISTRIBUTED CORPORATE EARNINGS SHOULD BE TAXED.

"With respect to corporate earnings which are distributed, no difficulty presents itself, as under the present system those earnings are taxed in identically the same way as similar earnings arising from business conducted in partnership form. Just as long as we do tax the undistributed partnership earnings, as at present, a compensating tax must be placed on the undistributed corporate earnings which correspond; a tax must be placed on those earnings which will practically equalize the tax borne by the shareholder and that borne by the sole trader or partner when each enjoys the same measure of prosperity.

"This tax on the current net income of corporations is simply a tax applied to that portion of the earnings of the investment of the individual shareholder which, assuming the repeal of the corporation income and excess-profits tax, otherwise entirely escapes taxation by reason of not being distributed. This tax should be so levied as to be free from any punitive element and from any attempt to force the distribution of dividends which should, for sound business reasons, be retained as working capital.

"The law should prevent the use of the corporate form of organization as a vehicle for shifting a just proportion of tax liability, or escaping a proportionate burden of taxation by the device of allowing earnings to accumulate undistributed.

"This undistributed-earnings tax is urged for two reasons:

"1. It will substantially equalize the tax burden of the individual shareholder with the tax burden of the sole trader or partner enjoying the same measure of prosperity.

"2. It will raise revenue for the Government in a manner substantially fair and equitable.

BASIS OF APPLYING A TAX ON UNDISTRIBUTED CORPORATE EARNINGS.

"There are so many different elements involved in the conduct of corporate business that the basis on which the rates of this undistributed-earnings tax are to be applied is of the greatest importance.

"Corporations are managed with different degrees of efficiency; are engaged in business where the elements of hazard vary in the extreme; earn various rates of return on the money invested and on the value of the assets; are engaged in business in which the opportunities for expansion vary greatly; finance their operations in different ways; and finally distribute in dividends to their shareholders a vastly different percentage of current net income.

"Probably the fairest and most equitable basis of constructing and applying the rates determined upon under this recommendation would be a combination of two factors: The value of the assets which are the basis of the current earnings and the percentage of those earnings remaining undistributed, and therefore free from income tax, in the hands of the individual shareholders.

VALUATION OF ASSETS.

"The valuation of assets leads to tremendous complications and would require an appraisal by the Government of the property of every corporation in the country. The determination of invested capital as defined in the present law has consumed endless time, labor, and expense on the part of both the Government and the taxpayer.

"The use of the present definition of invested capital as one of the factors in applying this tax would be entirely inadequate. This definition is so restricted as to establish an arbitrary amount, in many cases far above and in many other cases far below the real value of the assets.

"While there is considerable merit to the use of the present value of assets as a factor in applying this equalizing tax on the income of the corporation, which by reason of being undistributed is not made subject to the tax in the hands of the individual, still the committee has reached the conclusion that the difficulties of determining in a fair and equitable manner the value of the assets of a large number of corporations far outweighs the benefits to be derived from using such valuation as a factor.

A TAX ON UNDISTRIBUTED EARNINGS BASED ON THE PERCENTAGE UNDISTRIBUTED.

"The committee feels, giving weight to both the considerations of equity and simplicity, that the most desirable factor on which to base this undistributed earnings tax would be the percentage of the total current net income which remains undistributed, and considers this factor as being of the greatest importance in seeking equality as between different individuals who prosper equally.

"To illustrate, take the case of an individual who has a $40,000 share in the current income of a corporation. If the corporation were to distribute 25 per cent of its current net income in dividends, this individual would pay an individual income tax on $10,000. If the corporation were to distribute 75 per cent of its net income, this shareholder would pay individual income tax on $30,000, and on the difference of $20,000 received under the last example he would be paying a gradually increasing rate.

"The tax on undistributed earnings is recommended for the purpose of equalizing, as far as possible, the tax borne by this man when the corporation distributes but 25 per cent, and pays on his behalf taxes on the 75 per cent remaining. It is obvious, since the individual would pay at a gradually increasing rate, if he pays his own taxes, that when the corporation pays his tax for him—by paying a tax on earnings undistributed to him—the rates should be such as to be in a measure comparable. The rates should aim to produce the proper revenue but not at a sacrifice of substantial equality.

"The recommendation therefore is that the application of the undistributed earnings tax be based on the percentage of the total net income which remains undistributed and therefore free from income tax in the hands of the individual.

RATES.

"This tax on undistributed earnings being in lieu of taxes which would be paid on similar income by an individual receiving such income from a source other than corporate investment, should in its lowest bracket be equal to the lowest bracket of the individual income tax—4 per cent under the present law. The fixing of its highest bracket should be governed by two considerations:

"1. The greatest measure of equity to the shareholders as compared with other individuals; and

"2. Productivity from a revenue standpoint.

"The Secretary of the Treasury, the Hon. David F. Houston, in his annual report dated November 30, 1920, suggests that the rates of surtax on that part of the net income which is saved and reinvested in business be reduced by one-fifth and in no instance exceed 20 per cent.

"The recommendation heretofore made provides that the individual shareholder should pay his own normal tax. Should that be enacted into law, it would mean that the maximum rate of this proposed undistributed earnings tax would be 28 per cent; namely, the equalizing 8 per cent normal tax, plus 20 per cent maximum surtax, which would be the tax maximum paid by the individual if the earnings were distributed to him and reinvested in securities, the income of which is subject to tax. Therefore, we give for purposes of illustration, a tentative basis on which we may erect a schedule of rates. The making of rates, however, being a function of Congress, this committee does not presume to suggest what the rates should be, but above they have endeavored to set out the best thought on the subject, and the following tabulation is submitted for the sole purpose of illustrating the manner in which whatever rates might be determined on would be applied.

"With the foregoing in mind, the rates might, for example, be as follows:

"For the sake of simplicity in figures, the example is based on a corporation with a net income of $100,000, making no distribution. The undistributed earnings tax in this case would be as follows:

	Tax rate.	Amount of tax.	Cumulative total.
On the first 10 per cent of the total net income which remains undistributed, $10,000	Per cent. 4	$400	$400
On the next 10 per cent, $10,000	8	800	1,200
On the next 10 per cent, $10,000	12	1,200	2,400
On the next 10 per cent, $10,000	16	1,600	4,000
On the next 10 per cent, $10,000	20	2,000	6,000
On the next 10 per cent, $10,000	24	2,400	8,400
All over 60 per cent, $40,000	28	11,200	19,600

"The rates might be subjected to either more or less graduation than shown above, as the graduations above were made few and simple for the purpose of clarity. Also, the point at which the maximum rate is made to apply might be shifted either up or down as necessities seemed to warrant.

THE UNDISTRIBUTED EARNINGS TAX WILL NOT FORCE UNDUE DISTRIBUTION.

"The only argument which has been brought forward against the tax on undistributed earnings is that it would force distribution to shareholders of earnings which were needed in the business, this distribution being forced to avoid payment of the undistributed earnings tax by the corporation. This argument is fallacious for the following reasons:

"Corporations are managed by boards of directors which control payment of dividends by the corporation. The personnel of the boards of directors is almost invariably made up of the principal owners or their representatives.

"If the above-mentioned argument were sound, we would have to conclude that a board of directors would pay themselves dividends on which they would be obliged to pay a personal income tax in order to avoid bearing their share of a comparable tax assessed against the corporation, and that they would pay themselves these dividends and in so doing undermine the security of their investment in the corporation.

"It does not seem to this committee that any such accusation of intellectual weakness is justified against the owners of the corporations of the country.

"It seems to the committee that those corporations which are well managed and which are earning income, and therefore are the ones to which this tax would apply, are competent to manage their affairs, and will not undermine the security of their investment for the purpose of exempting the corporation from tax and according themselves the privilege of paying a comparable tax on such income.

"Such a tax would not in any way restrict expansion commensurate with the legitimate requirements of the business, although it might act as a deterrent to any abnormal expansion which the committee believes should be financed through new securities, thus obtaining the consent of all the shareholders to the program.

"The Secretary of the Treasury in his report just recently issued has suggested an additional tax of 6 per cent on corporation incomes.

"Your committee believes that there is no sound reason why there should be any tax paid by corporations on the income which they distribute. Many eminent legal minds, including the members of the Supreme Court of the United States, have stated that a corporation is merely an aggregation of individuals, and your committee, believing as it does in the principles of taxation of income on the basis of ability to pay, and believing that every individual of the country should be permitted to pay his own tax, can see no reason why any tax should be paid by the corporation against that part of the income which is distributed to the shareholder and therefore can be equitably taxed in his possession. Any flat tax on corporations deprives the small shareholder not only of the personal exemption the law accords him but also deprives him of the benefit of the lower rate on the first $4,000 over his exemption.

"It seems to your committee that there is no reason why a corporation as such should pay any Federal tax which is not in like manner assessed against a partnership or an individual conducting an identical institution.

"The present tax law is collecting in the neighborhood of $100,000,000 from the corporations of the country under the capital-stock tax for the privilege of doing business in corporate form. If the Federal Government is to levy any tax on the privilege of doing business in corporate form, then it would seem that such a tax as the capital stock is the fairest measure possible under the Constitution.

"The corporation income tax has been generally considered as paid in behalf of the shareholders in lieu of the normal tax and dividends have accordingly been made exempt from the normal tax. Under this plan the corporation income tax and the individual normal tax should be at the same rate.

"The recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury suggests a still wider spread between the flat individual normal rate and the corporation income tax rate. If this extra rate on corporate income is designed to be a tax on the privilege of doing business in corporate form, it is fundamentally wrong. At first glance it seems to be founded with only one idea in mind—to get the money.

"Any tax on the total net income of corporations designed to equalize the taxes paid by partners or sole traders on the undistributed earnings of their business should not be considered for the reasons that we have pointed out elsewhere.

THE ADVANTAGES OF THE UNDISTRIBUTED EARNINGS TAX.

"In so far as it is practicable, the undistributed earnings tax will equalize taxation.

"1. It will thus be closed to the serious objection which is directed against the excess-profits tax and may be directed against some of the substitutes proposed for it.

"2. Since it is an extension of the income-tax principle, it does not require the setting up of new tax machinery.

"3. It combines with the income tax flexibility of rate.

"4. By removing the penalty that rests on small shareholders it will encourage the investment on the part of larger groups in shares of corporations and thus contribute to the financial and economic stability of the country.

OTHER PROPOSED SUBSTITUTES—THE SALES OR TRANSFER TAX.

"A tax on sales as a substitute for the excess-profits tax numbers many adherents among groups of business men. The advocates of this tax claim for it many virtues, among them simplicity, equity, and ease of collection. It is the opinion of this committee that this tax not only does not embody these virtues but that its enactment into law would be, at this time, most unsound and unwise. The committee therefore rejects the sales tax as a proposed substitute. In support of this course it offers the following analysis:

ANALYSIS OF THE SALES TAX.

"Three general forms of a tax on sales may be distinguished:

"1. A tax (at a suggested rate of 1 per cent) on every sale or turnover of commodities and services, real property, capital assets, rent, and interest.

"2. A tax (at a suggested rate of 1 per cent) on every sale or turnover of goods, wares, and merchandise (limited to commodities).

"3. A tax on all final sales of goods, wares, and merchandise for consumption or use.

"The first two taxes are very similar and may well be treated together.

THE DIFFICULTY OF SATISFACTORY DEFINITION.

"It is difficult to define the word 'sale.' It has been well pointed out by Dr. T. S. Adams in his monograph, 'The Sale Tax,' that mere sale transfer of title, in modern commerce and industry, is frequently a matter of convenience only. It can be postponed, divided, and often avoided. Leases, contracts for sale, commission and agency arrangements in lieu of sale trading, would be stimulated if a sales tax were enacted.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SALES TAX.

"It is impossible, of course, to predict with accuracy the extent of the difficulties of administering the sales tax. Any tax, however, which is difficult of definition is difficult of administration. The tax force of the Treasury, it is well known, has been unable to cope with the difficulties provided by the excess-profits tax. While it is true that the repeal of this tax will relieve the Treasury to a considerable extent, it must be emphasized that the introduction of an entirely new type of tax, the sales tax, will demand the installation of a new type of tax machinery. The Treasury experts assert that the administrative task of covering and checking all industries and occupations of the country in connection with a sales tax will be colossal. (The extension of the income-tax principle, on the other hand, will make use of the machinery of taxation already existing, which may reasonably be expected to improve in efficiency and technique.)

THE EFFECT OF THE GENERAL SALES OR TURNOVER TAX.

"There still remains, however, to be considered the important question of the effect of the application of this tax. Since this tax (and for this purpose 1 and 2 may be considered the same tax) is not levied on individual income or earnings, but is based on sales, the question of its incidence must play a prominent part in any discussion of it. Who bears the tax? Is it shifted or is it not shifted? Or is it shifted in part? The arguments in favor of or against this tax must vary with the answers to these questions.

SHIFTING OR NOT SHIFTING THE SALES TAX.

"The question of the incidence of the sales tax is too involved to permit of easy generalization. Two points that find general acceptance may, however, be made. In general it may be said that in a declining market and under close competition the sales or turnover tax will frequently be borne by the seller, and thus may even constitute an added loss. In a rising market the tax may frequently be (and undoubtedly frequently is) shifted. Only a careful study of the particular commodity under discussion in each period will answer this question. But whatever the difficulty of determining when the tax is or is not shifted, the fact remains that under certain circumstances the tax is (1) not shifted at all and thus borne by the seller or is (2) either wholly shifted and thus borne by the consumer or is (3) partly shifted and thus borne by both seller and consumer.

THE INJUSTICE OF THE SALES TAX WHEN SHIFTED TO THE CONSUMER.

"If the tax is shifted to the consumer it will result in a gross violation of the principle of taxing according to ability to pay. Extended to all articles of consumption, it will be a tax on the necessaries of life that will fall most heavily on those with little or no ability to pay. Unlike the income tax, which recognizes exemptions, it recognizes no exemptions. Passed on to the consumer, the tax on sales constitutes a tax on purchases. Taxing purchases at the same rate, however, is quite a different matter from taxing individual income at the same rate, for income is an index of tax-paying ability, whereas purchases are not. This tax on sales or purchases will mean that the man of low or moderate income with a family of four or five children will bear an unduly heavy tax burden. The man with a large income, with one or two or no children, whose income and ability to pay vastly exceed that of the first man, will be taxed relatively very lightly. The sales tax, therefore, not only does not tax in proportion to income and ability to pay; it actually taxes often in inverse ratio to income and ability to pay.

INCREASING THE TAX BURDEN BY PYRAMIDING.

"The burden of this tax is likely to be rendered more severe by the pyramiding to which it is open. The tax may be passed on cumulatively until it reaches the final consumer, this consumer bearing thus not only one tax but several taxes, the number depending upon the number of hands through which the commodity has passed. Conceived as a substitute for the excess-profits tax, it will in effect relieve business of $450,000,000 of taxes and place this burden upon consumers with little or no regard to their ability to pay.

THE INJUSTICES OF THE SALES TAX WHEN NOT SHIFTED AND THUS BORNE BY THE SELLER.

"The rate usually suggested for the sales tax is 1 per cent. The discriminatory effect of this rate becomes clearly apparent upon analysis. If a tax measure can be defined and framed to include every possible kind of sale or service, so that nothing will escape—so that the sale of stock, the sale of merchandise, and the sale of service of physician, architect, engineer, lawyer, wage earner, salaried man, etc., the sale of capital assets, the sale of transportation, etc., will be taxed and taxed at the suggested rate of 1 per cent—there will not be lacking strenuous opposition from every quarter. This opposition will take the form of a general objection. 'But there are sales and sales,' and the objection will be justified. It is obviously unfair to tax at the same rate of 1 per cent the sales on the stock market, the ordinary sales of merchandise, and the sales of capital assets, to say nothing of taxing at the same rate all the different types of sales of service.

GROSS SALES ARE NOT A FAIR INDEX OF NET INCOME.

"The inequity of the 1 per cent rate is revealed in a more startling fashion by a consideration of sales of commodities. Gross sales do not form a proper basis for the computation of business profits, and hence for the application of a common flat rate of tax. Taxing gross sales of all merchandising enterprises at the same rate of 1 per cent will result in inequalities without number. Smith, for example, may make a net profit of $20,000 on gross sales of $100,000. Jones may make the same net profit of $20,000 on gross sales of $400,000. Jones has turned over his stock far more rapidly than Smith. With a tax of 1 per cent he will be compelled to pay $4,000, while Smith with the same net profit will pay but $1,000.

"An intimate knowledge of business is not necessary to appreciate the possible variations of this type of injustice. Business enterprises which are characterized by rapid turnover, and hence are likely to show a low rate of profit to total sales, are penalized, while business enterprises characterized by a low rate of turnover and presumably a high rate of profit compared to sales are favored. Specifically it will mean that wholesale business, with a rapid turnover and low margins of profits compared to sales, will pay taxes wholly out of proportion to their net income. Wholesale dealers whose businesses are characterized by a relatively low rate of turnover and a relatively high rate of profits compared to sales, will be proportionately favored. The discrimination applies with equal force to retail concerns. The 1 per cent tax on gross sales in some instances will, in normal and good years, be equivalent in some cases to one-quarter to one-half of the net income of going concerns, and will thus in reality tax these concerns at a rate of 25 or 50 per cent.

THE EFFECT OF THE SALES TAX IN A FALLING MARKET.

"The effect of such a grossly inequitable tax in a period of rapidly declining prices will, of course, be still more serious. In such a period large total annual sales may be made with little or no profit. In such an event a tax on sales will eliminate profit entirely, or even constitute a loss to the business. The implications of such a tax are far-reaching. It would mean an entire reorganization, an entire readjustment of prices in individual businesses and in business at large. Such a readjustment could not be undertaken at any time without serious difficulties. To adjust the rate of tax in an attempt to distinguish fairly between all the various types of business is on the face of it impossible and would invite confusion. To be equitable, the rate of tax would have to be adjusted to every business in every line, for the ratio of net profits to gross sales varies with every business and every line.

THE INJUSTICES OF THE GENERAL TURNOVER TAX WHEN PARTIALLY SHIFTED—THE SALES TAX DISCRIMINATES IN FAVOR OF INTEGRATED BUSINESS.

"Just as there are times when the general turnover tax will not be shifted at all or will be wholly shifted, so there are times when this tax will be partially shifted. The extent to which it will be shifted will vary and may not be predicted. One per cent, 5 per cent, 50 per cent, 95 per cent, or 99 per cent of the tax may be shifted. The result of this partially shifted tax will be to distribute the injustices of this tax between the seller and the consumer. Distributing these injustices, however, no matter in what proportion, will mitigate little, if at all, the evil results of the tax. Both types of injustices—the injustice to the seller and the injustice to the consumer—are in themselves flagrant. If the tax is only partially shifted, and the degree of shifting is not determinable, the business men of the country will face not only certain injustices of the tax but a serious uncertainty in marking their prices.

"A sales tax that includes all the sales of a commodity in its passage from the raw state to the finished state in the hands of the ultimate consumer gives a tremendous advantage to the so-called integrated industry of business—i. e., to the industry that carries on several consecutive processes of manufacture and distribution—over those businesses that carry on only one of the processes of manufacture and distribution.

"There are integrated industries that make but one sale of their product as it passes from the raw to the finished state in the hands of some ultimate consumer. Three, four, five, six, seven, or more sales of the same product take place as it moves from the raw state to the finished product through the hands of independent businesses, each of which carries on only one of the processes of manufacture and distribution.

"The fabrication of a tenpenny nail may serve to illustrate the discrimination that result from the tax on sales. In a nonintegrated industry eight taxes are borne by the eight concerns which manufacture and distribute the commodity:

"Tax 1. Paid by the company which mines the iron ore.

"Tax 2. Paid by the company which carries the ore to the port on Lake Erie.

"Tax 3. Paid by the dock company which unloads the ore.

"Tax 4. Paid by the railroad company which carries the ore to the blast furnace.

"Tax 5. Paid by the blast furnace which smelts the ore.

"Tax 6. Paid by the steel mill which transforms the pig iron into steel.

"Tax 7. Paid by the factory which makes the nail.

"Tax 8. Paid by the wholesale hardware house which buys the nail from the factory.

"A highly integrated industry which controls the process of production and distribution will escape possibly all these taxes. It is thus in a position to compete at a tremendous advantage over these businesses which are taxed. It will be impossible for the nonintegrated industries to market the tenpenny nail at the price made by the integrated industry.

THE EFFECT OF THE SALES TAX ON BUSINESS ORGANIZATION.

"Former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell has predicted that such a tax would in five years revolutionize present methods of doing business, because means of getting around the intermediate turnover tax would be devised and put into effect. Whatever may be said as to the merits or demerits of our present system of business organization there surely can be no justification for instituting a tax measure which will disrupt that intricate organization for no other reason than for the purpose of collecting taxes.

"For the reasons given above which are here briefly recapitulated, the general turnover tax should be rejected:

"1. It is difficult to define satisfactorily.

"2. It is difficult of administration and involves the setting up of a new tax machinery.

"3. If shifted to the consumer, it constitutes a violation of the principle of taxing in accordance with ability to pay, for it will fall heavily upon the necessities of life and be paid largely by those with little ability to pay.

"4. If not shifted and thus borne by the seller, it discriminates against businesses that have large sales with a small rate of profit compared to sales. The 1 per cent tax on such businesses may be the equivalent of a 25 to 50 per cent tax on profits, and in abnormal years may tax all profits away and even cause deficits.

"5. If only partially shifted, it discriminates against individual businesses and in favor of integrated business that carries on several processes of manufacture and distribution, and involves also injustices to both seller and consumer.

ANALYSIS OF THE TAX ON FINAL OR RETAIL SALES OF GOODS, WARES, AND MERCHANDISE FOR CONSUMPTION OR USE.

"All the criticisms leveled at the general turnover tax (Nos. 1 and 2) can not be directed against the retail tax on all final sales (No. 3). Since it is a tax on final sales, it obviously will not discriminate in favor of integrated industry. In addition, the possibility of pyramiding the tax is removed. Since it eliminates sales of capital assets and sales of services, some of the difficulties connected with a satisfactory definition and rate of tax are removed. But serious difficulties still remain—difficulties both of definition and application.

THE DIFFICULTY OF DEFINING FINAL SALES FOR CONSUMPTION OR USE.

"It is difficult to determine whether a final sale is made for consumption or use, or whether it is made for business purposes. Serious administrative problems will arise as a result of this difficulty. In connection with this problem Dr. T. S. Adams, in his article 'Difficulties of the sales tax,' says:

"Limiting the tax to final sales would create a difficult administrative problem. Merchants and other dealers would be required to secure affidavits from purchasers stating whether the goods were to be consumed or to be resold, either as bought or in some changed form. Would purchasers tell the truth? How about purchases of gasoline, coal, and similar commodities or services which can be used either in business or for final consumption?

"Certificates of this kind, distinguishing purchases for resale from purchases for consumption and use, are now employed in connection with some of the existing sales taxes; but they are said to lead to considerable evasion. It is an even question whether such a device could be successfully administered. In any event, the sales tax, like the income tax, would depend almost wholly on the honesty of the taxpayer for its successful collection. Experience with the income tax indicates that the honesty of the taxpayer, particularly in case of the larger business concerns, is capable of withstanding the strain, provided an administrative force large enough to check and supervise the returns is employed. The administrative problem would be a huge one, with almost every business concern in the country which sells at retail subject to the tax.

INJUSTICES OF THE RETAIL TAX WHEN BORNE BY THE CONSUMER.

"Since the retail tax or the tax on final sales is not susceptible of pyramiding (being only one tax), it is not so flagrant a violation of the principle of taxing in accordance with the ability to pay as is the general turnover tax. It does, however, seriously violate this principle. As is the case with the general turnover tax, it will fall most heavily on families with only a living wage or with only a moderate income and comparatively lightly on families with a large income. It recognizes no exemptions. The poor man with five children pays taxes on pairs of shoes for all his five children. The man of wealth and great ability to pay, who has but one or two children or no children, pays taxes on a smaller number of shoes. Similar comparisons might be instituted between consumption by these two contrasted families of all necessaries of life. The poor man may bear a tax burden on the necessaries of life as great as, if not greater than, that borne by the rich man, and he obviously has not the ability to do so. If this tax measure is enacted it will mean relieving business of a heavy tax and placing it on the shoulders of consumers without regard to their relative ability to pay.

INJUSTICES OF THE TAX ON FINAL SALES WHEN BORNE BY THE RETAILER.

"As is the case with the general turnover tax on sales, retail sales are not a fair index of business prosperity or profits. A tax on retail gross sales, therefore, taxes unfairly those businesses which have large yearly sales and a low rate of profit as compared with these sales.

"When borne by the retailer it introduces another type of injustice. Why should the retailer be singled out to bear the tax while the wholesalers and manufacturers are relieved of its burden?

"The tax on final sales is, therefore, to be rejected for the reasons given above and briefly set forth here:

"1. It is difficult of definition and administration.

"2. When shifted to the consumer it is a gross violation of the principle of ability to pay.

"3. When borne by the seller it discriminates unfairly in favor of businesses with small total sales and a high rate of profit and against businesses with large total sales and a low rate of profit.

"4. When borne by the retailer it imposes the sole tax burden upon him, thus discriminating in favor of manufacturers and wholesalers.

PRINCIPLES OF TAXATION.

"One hundred and fifty years ago Adam Smith, the great economist of the eighteenth century, enunciated four principles of taxation that ever since have been considered the cardinal principles of taxation. They are:

"1. 'The subjects of every State ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called equality or inequality of taxation.'

"2. Taxes should be certain, not arbitrary, 'the time of payment, the manner of payment, the quantity to be paid, ought to be clear and plain to the contributor and to every other person.'

"3. Taxes should be convenient both as to time and manner of payment.

"4. 'Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the State'; in other words, the expense of collecting the taxes should be as low as possible, and taxes should be so levied as to interfere as little as possible with the industrial activities of the nation.

EQUALITY OF TAXATION AND ABILITY TO PAY.

"The last three of these four principles need no elucidation; they are self-explanatory. Since Adam Smith's time increasing emphasis has been laid on the first principle, which demands the equality of taxation. The further Governments have advanced from exactions by force the more have they been concerned that taxation shall be essentially just and equitable.

"What does it mean for individuals 'to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities?' It was formerly quite generally held that taxing individuals in exact proportion to their respective income was taxing them in proportion to their respective abilities, but opposition to this point of view has gained strength increasingly until to-day there are few students of taxation who defend such a tax on grounds of fairness and justice.

"Equality of taxation, in the words of John Stuart Mill, the great English economist and statesman, means equality of sacrifice. It means apportioning the contribution of each persons toward the expense of governments so that he shall feel neither more nor less inconvenienced from his contribution than every other person experiences from his. 'Equality of sacrifice' leads away from proportional taxation to progressive taxation, for it is obvious that taking $10 from an individual whose income is $1,000 demands a greater sacrifice than taking $100 from an individual whose income is $10,000.

"Modern tax legislation in western Europe and the United States has recognized this objection to the proportional tax which Mill condemned as involving inequality of sacrifice; it condemns the proportional tax because it violates the principle of faculty or ability to pay. This principle may be stated thus: The ability to pay of an individual increases progressively with the increase in his income. The adherents of this principle assume for purposes of illustration a family of five with an income of $3,000 a year and a family of five with an income of $30,000 a year, both subject to a tax of 4 per cent. They conclude (disregarding exemptions) that the head of a family whose income is $30,000 has greater ability to pay a tax of $1,200 than the head of a family with an income of $3,000 has to pay a tax of $120. The $3,000 of the first family is needed almost entirely for the necessities of life, and taxes from this $3,000 may have to be taken from these necessities, from necessary food and clothing, or necessary medical attendance, or necessary savings, such as life insurance. In the case of the richer family the $1,200 in taxes is taken entirely from income above that needed for necessities.

"The adherents of the principle of taxing according to the ability to pay ask, therefore, that the major burden of Government expense be borne by those who enjoy an income in amount more than that required for the actual necessities of life, and that the rates of taxation be stepped up as the income increases. What income should be enjoyed by the individual free from the application of the tax is a question involving careful study and thought.

"To what extent ability to pay increases with the increase of income is not capable of mathematical proof. The practical working out of a progressive rate of taxation is a matter for tax experts, who must take into account the effect on progressive rates of taxation of various factors, among which the existence of tax-free securities constitutes a modifying element of considerable importance.

"Taxation of income in accordance with ability to pay constitutes essential justice in taxation. The tax systems of many countries are based on it and the tax systems of many others are moving toward it.

THE COURSE OF TAXATION.

"The movement of taxation toward this ideal—taxation in accordance with ability to pay—is nowhere better described than by Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University, in his 'Essays on taxation'; 'Amid the clashing of divergent interests, and the endeavor of each social class to roll off the burden of taxation on some other class, we discern the slow and laborious growth of standards of justice in taxation and the attempt on the part of the community as a whole to realize this justice. The history of finance, in other words, shows from one point of view, at least, the evolution of the principle of faculty or ability in taxation—the principle that each individual should be held to help the State in proportion to his ability to help himself. In the earliest indirect payments, there was no idea of equity, but only of force, but with the advance of civilization and social ethics we reach the first stage of equality in the poll tax. Step by step the revenue system advanced to successively higher planes—expenditure, property, product—each of these in turn was considered the test of individual capacity and obligation toward the State until finally, in modern times, income has come to be regarded as the most equitable and the most practical measure of individual and social faculty. To arrange a system of taxation a large part of which shall, on the whole, correspond as closely as possible to the net revenue of individuals, and which shall take into account the variations in tax paying ability, has thus become the demand of modern civilization.'"

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say to Senators who desire to speak on the pending amendment that I am not going to take more than about 15 minutes and possibly not that long. I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read an amendment which I intend to propose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The READING CLERK. On page 79, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "15" and to insert "10" and the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, directed, and instructed at the earliest practicable moment to secure from the several foreign Governments, namely, Belgium, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Liberia, Rumania, Russia, and Serbia, to which Governments moneys were loaned by the United States, under and by virtue of several war emergency acts of Congress, passed in the years 1917 and 1918, long-time interest-bearing bonds of such Governments for the moneys loaned under the said acts, the interest on such bonds to be paid by said Governments semiannually at rates not less than those fixed in said acts.

That in making settlements with the several foreign Governments aforesaid the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to take interest-bearing bonds for the past-due interest on said loans and the future interest up to January 1, 1922, such bonds to be of like tenor and effect as the bonds for the principal loaned to said Governments, and the interest thereon to be paid semiannually in like manner.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure from such foreign Governments as may be indebted to the United States, of like tenor and effect and of like rates of interest and payable in like manner, for the following indebtedness: (1) Obligations received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war material; (2) obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation; (3) obligations received by the Treasurer from the American relief administration; (4) obligations due the United States on any other account from such foreign nations.

The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure bonds, of like tenor and effect and like rates of interest, for the indebtedness due the United States from the following nations: Armenia, Austria, Esthonia, Finland, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, and Poland.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept, in addition to said bonds, any securities from such foreign Governments as collateral and as a guaranty of the prompt payment of said bonds and interest thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on a previous occasion I have explained this amendment rather fully; and I am going to take only a few moments to explain it again to the Senate today, before it is voted on this afternoon.

Briefly stated, the amendment provides that the indebtedness owed us by foreign countries shall be settled under the terms of the loan acts of 1917 and 1918. It not only provides that the principal shall be settled in that way, but it also provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may take bonds for the past-due interest up to and including January 1, 1922. It also authorizes him to take bonds for other indebtedness owed us by these foreign nations, such as for supplies that have been recently sold to certain other governments, for the relief funds that we turned over to them, for the funds devoted by the Grain Corporation for their benefit, and all other funds. It does not require a cent of cash to be paid, but it requires that bonds be taken for the foreign indebtedness, and that after January 1 the interest shall be paid by the several governments. It gives full authority to the Secretary to carry out the matter in accordance with the acts of 1917 and 1918.

I want to explain to the Senate now why I take this position, and it seems to me it is incontrovertible.

It would be little short of infamous on our part to vary the terms under which these loans were made to our allies. I saw a statement the other day that the matter ought to be turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury to make "the best trade he can." Nothing could be more unfair or unjust, perhaps to our allies and perhaps to our own people. For instance, we loaned moneys to our allies on precisely the same terms that we borrowed them from our own people. If we were now to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make a contract and he should make a contract making the best possible trade and increasing the rates of interest, or making any of the terms harsher or harder than is provided in those acts, we would have violated our faith with the Allies to whom we loaned this money. It would be unfair to have said in 1917, "We are going to loan you this money under these terms" and five years later to come along and make the terms harder or harsher to the Allies. On the other hand, it is just as important that we keep faith with the American people, who loaned this money. If we make those terms different, if we make them less than the terms upon which they borrowed the money, we will break faith with the American people, from whom we borrowed it to turn over to our foreign allies. There is but one honest way, there is but one straightforward way, and that is to carry out the terms of our contract with our allies and continue to let them keep this money on precisely the same terms that were established by act of Congress. The money was loaned by us on those terms. It was accepted by the Allies on those terms.

Some say, however, "Oh, we ought not to be harsh with our allies. We ought not to be hard on them." There is no one in the world who indorses that sentiment more than I. I would be the last one to be harsh or hard on them; but let us see, if we carry out the terms of the acts under which the loans were made, if we are hard or if we are harsh.

Senators will recall that at that time the bonds of the nations that borrowed the money were few, if any of them, selling on the market for more than 50 cents on the dollar. Some of them were selling for less than that.

The very best bonds were worth little over 50 cents on the dollar at the time, and yet we loaned them dollar for dollar, and at what rates of interest? At a hard rate of interest or at a harsh rate of interest? No. We lent this money to our allies dollar for dollar, a portion of it at 3½ per cent, a portion at 4 per cent, a portion at 4¼ per cent, a portion at 4½ per cent, and, I believe, a small portion at 5 per cent. Are those harsh terms? Two weeks before we went into the war, two weeks before these acts were passed, these very allies of ours were borrowing money all over the world at ruinous rates of interest and at tremendous discounts. Can it be said now, after we have won our common cause, that we are harsh with our allies in asking them as much as 3½ per cent or 4 per cent or 5 per cent, according to the time at which the money was loaned, for money that was then and is now worth a great deal more?

I do not see how Senators are going to defend their votes when they say that those terms are harsh on our allies. I make this statement: No Government in the history of time ever borrowed money on such favorable terms in time of war. Harsh terms? Why, it is an insult to ordinary intelligence to talk about these terms being harsh—3½ per cent, 4½ per cent, 5 per cent only in one instance, I believe, for money for which no discount was charged, dollar for dollar, for bonds that had no real intrinsic value at the time, or were of a very doubtful intrinsic value. Can it be said that when we offer to carry out our contract it is harsh upon our allies? As I said before, I would be the last man in the world to ask for a harsh bargain with our allies; but what we are asking is a fair, square trade for our money.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator what is meant in his amendment by the words "long-time interest-bearing bonds"?

Mr. McKELLAR. The words are used in the original act, and my recollection is that the time was fixed at 20 years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Did not the original act provide that the loans to those Governments should be for the same period as the maturity of our bonds?

Mr. McKELLAR. Precisely; and this does not change it. The term used in the act is "long-time bonds." It is used for this other reason: Under the original act it was provided that the bonds should run for the same length of time as the bonds that we issued to our own people in order to get the money. Those in authority did not take long-time bonds, but took I O U's for the indebtedness. The purpose of this is to prevent that being done, and to require a settlement under the acts of 1917 and 1918.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Should not the Senator state in his amendment, then, the maturity of the bonds that he desires the Treasury Department to accept?

Mr. McKELLAR. It does state that, by requiring them to accept exactly the same kind of bonds that are provided for in the acts of 1917 and 1918, and that is provided for in those acts. It says, "at rates not less than those fixed in said acts." That clause provides for just what the Senator refers to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator thinks it can be clarified I shall be glad to accept an amendment, because I want to do the very thing the Senator is talking about. If the Senator will offer an amendment to it at the proper time I will accept that amendment, if he will just figure it out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator desires, then, to have the maturity of these bonds correspond to the maturity of the bonds already issued by the Government of the United States?

Mr. McKELLAR. Precisely, under the terms of the acts of 1917 and 1918.

Mr. President, just a word or two more, because I know that other Senators doesire to have something to say about their amendments, and I surely do not want to take time that should be distributed among other Senators.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator one question. I notice that he provides for striking out on page 79, line 6, "15 per cent" and inserting "10 per cent."

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the flat tax upon corporations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is now 10 per cent, and the bill proposes to raise it to 15 per cent, so as to make up some of the loss resulting from the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand now that the Senator proposes to change that so as to continue the present rate of 10 per cent instead of 15, and he proposes to make up the 5 per cent that he strikes out by the collection of interest from foreign Governments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Can the Senator give us any assurance that we will be able to collect enough interest, if any, in the next fiscal year to make up the 5 per cent that we would lose by that reduction in the corporation tax?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I can only say this: The difference between 10 per cent and 15 per cent will amount to $260,000,000 a year. The interest, if collected on all of this indebtedness, would amount to $500,000,000 a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is collected.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is collected. I have seen and have read to the Senate statements by the fiscal officers of England, among them Mr. Chamberlain, who said that the interest payments would begin to be made on January 1, 1922.

The payments of interest by Great Britain alone would amount to $225,000,000 a year, in round numbers, and I take it that it is beyond the shadow of a doubt that if Congress will adopt this amendment, making it a part of the law, and the Secretary would carry it out and take the bonds with interest-bearing coupons, the Government of Great Britain would never permit those interest coupons to be unpaid. The Government of Great Britain is not defunct; it is not bankrupt; nor is the Government of France; nor is the Government of Italy. As I pointed out here some time ago, Great Britain borrowed money from other Governments besides the United States, not on the same liberal terms on which she borrowed it from the United States, but she borrowed it from other nations of Europe, and since that time she has paid back principal and interest of those debts; not the interest merely, as we ask, but she has paid back the principal and interest. She paid the last principal payment to Sweden or Denmark, as I recall it, about two months ago, and there can not be any question about it. I take it that it is beyond controversy that if this debt question is settled this way there will be at least $260,000,000 of the interest collected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, of course, if Great Britain should pay her interest within the fiscal year we would probably get enough to offset the 5 per cent; but if Great Britain does not pay it we have no way that I know of to force her to pay it right away, and is it not rather a risky thing to be turning loose a bird in hand in the hope of catching one not in hand?

If the Senator will allow me to ask him another question, why does he want in this amendment to offset the money which he expects to get, which would go into the Treasury, with some item in the bill, relieving a particular class of taxpayers of a large amount of taxes that otherwise they would have to pay? If he wants to relieve any taxpayer through the collection of this interest, why did he select corporations? There are other institutions in this country which would like to participate in the event of reductions that would be allowed on account of the collection of this interest, as well as the corporations, and I do not think the corporations, having gotten a reduction of $400,000,000, ought to come and ask us to use this interest money to make up the additional 5 per cent exemption to them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there are perhaps other taxes that might be reduced, as the Senator suggests, on account of the collection of this interest, but I want to call his attention to the fact——

Mr. SIMMONS. Why give the benefit to the corporations?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer the Senator. I can not answer the Senator, however, if the Senator is going to take all my time in asking me. There are other Senators who want to talk, too.

The corporations are paying but 10 per cent now and the tax is to be raised to 15 per cent. Under this tax bill there are certain corporations that are relieved of the excess-profits tax, but the burden is put upon other corporations, which are made to bear it, and among them are these corporations which will pay an increase of from 10 to 15 per cent. It seemed to me to be very proper to take this particular place in the bill to prevent an increase of taxation upon the business of the country rather than to take it at some other place.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I have been listening attentively to the Senator's plan, but I have not been able to detect that he covers this proposition, which has to be considered: Suppose any of the foreign debtors are unable or unwilling to pay? How does the Senator propose to collect the debt?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have considered that matter, of course. It is not certain that all of them will pay during the year 1922, although I think it is exceedingly likely that they all will. Surely if little countries like Cuba and Greece can pay the interest on their debts, great countries like France and Italy and Great Britain, who owe over three-fourths of the debt, can pay the interest on theirs. Greece and Cuba have done it regularly ever since they borrowed the money. But a large margin has been allowed. If the corporation tax is not raised from 10 to 15 per cent next year, the difference will be $260,000,000. If just a trifle over half of this interest is collected, it will be ample to make up that deficit. We all recognize that Great Britain is able to pay the interest on its indebtedness, and if she alone pays her interest it will come very nearly making up the difference between the revenue to be yielded through the tax of 10 per cent and that yielded through the tax of 15 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. I know what the effect would be if they paid the debt in a general way——

Mr. McKELLAR. Not the debt; I am only asking that they pay the interest on the debt.

Mr. LODGE. But I put again my question, Suppose they are unable, as some of them undoubtedly are, or suppose they are unwilling, as some of them may be, to pay the interest or the principal? How does the Senator propose to collect it?

Mr. McKELLAR. My judgment is that after we have expended $11,000,000,000 for the worthy and even noble purpose of saving the British Empire, for the purpose of saving and adding to the French Republic, for the purpose of saving and adding to the Kingdom of Italy, and the others, I do not believe those nations will decline to pay us the interest on the money when we make it a part of our budget, and I feel that it is almost as certain that we will collect this interest as that we will collect the $260,000,000 estimated from the increased tax on corporations. We all know there is doubt about collecting that $260,000,000 of increased taxes on corporations, because the profits of corporations have gone steadily down, down, down, almost ever since the war closed.

Mr. LODGE. All that the Senator says is very interesting, I have listened to it before with pleasure, and I am glad to hear it again; but the Senator does not answer my question, which is this: Assuming that they can not or will not pay, how does he propose to collect it?

Mr. McKELLAR. The asking of the question by the Senator answers itself. If we do not get the money, if they do not pay the interest, we will not have it, just the same as if the corporations are unable to pay their 15 per cent, we will not have it. If they do not pay the whole of the $260,000,000, if there is a deficit from the estimates, we will not have it.

Mr. LODGE. I am not trying to get the Senator's idea of what we would do if we did not get the money; I was trying to get at the method he would suggest for the collection of the debt. We know how a debt is collected under the judgment of a court, and I wanted to find out if there was any method of collecting the debt other than asking them to pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. If they refuse, after the 1st of January, to pay the interest on their debt——

Mr. LODGE. Or are unable to pay it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or are unable to pay it, Congress will be in session and there is no reason in the world why Congress can not make up the deficiency. We have done it time and time again.

Mr. LODGE. That amounts to saying that we have no method of enforcing the collection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I have never contended there was any method. There is but one method of compelling the collection of a debt from a foreign country, as I understand it, and that is by force. But we ought to do our duty toward the American people by attempting to collect the debt. No steps have been taken to collect the interest on these debts up to date, and we ought to take the reasonable, ordinary, regular course, in perfect consonance with what is honest and what is straight and what is right in the matter, and in accordance with the statutes under which we loaned the money and under which our allies received the money.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's amendment, it does not propose to demand the payment of the debts of these nations, but simply to secure from them the proper bonds to deposit in our Treasury as evidence of the debt?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right, and the interest coupons, in order that they may be collected as and when they fall due after January 1, 1922.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And it provides that for all they owe us on interest up to the 1st of January, 1922, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue long-time bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just exactly as he does for the principal, of course. There is nothing at stake here except getting the bonds and the collection of the interest on them after January 1, 1922.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. All there is at stake at the present time is the securing of evidences of their debt from those nations which owe us the money.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In the form of bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the form in which we agreed and they agreed that they would be given to us, which has not been done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I asked that question because the Senator from Massachusetts seemed to assume that this involved a demand that the nations should pay their debts. It does not do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not understand that the Senator from Massachusetts thought that was what I was driving at. Surely, everyone knows there is no way of collecting the debt except by force, if the nation refuses to pay it, but I can not think of any nation to which moneys were loaned under the terms of the acts of 1917 and 1918, for the purposes expressed in those acts, would for a moment refuse to pay the interest upon the loans that were thus made to them after a demand by us.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not mean to suggest that it would ever be necessary to resort to any method of collecting this interest on the debts. The subject of the method we might pursue in collecting the debts is a very delicate one to pursue; but though I do not mean to imply that it might be applied, there is such a thing as economic pressure, which is quite different from force, and which might be effective.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have just a word or two more to say and I am done. I have been kept longer than I expected by the interruption of Senators, and shall take just a few moments more.

It is claimed that Great Britain and France and Italy are not able to pay the interest. Mr. President, it was pointed out the other day by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] that the increase in the national wealth of Great Britain, from the time she went into the war to the time when the peace negotiations were concluded, was $50,000,000,000, and that the increase in the national wealth of France amounted to $25,000,000,000. Great Britain received, as her part of the spoils of war, an empire of 42,800,000 people, and yet people talk about those nations not being able to pay the interest on the money that was devoted to the saving of their empires and their kingdoms and their republics. She entered into a treaty compelling Germany to pay her $30,000,000,000 perhaps, and yet it is claimed she is not able to pay us the interest on her $4,250,000,000 indebtedness. If Germany is able to pay that enormous sum to England, surely England can pay us interest on her debts to us.

There is a propaganda going on, started in London and continued in this country, which seeks the cancellation of these debts. I read an article in the London Outlook of October 8 which said that America must cancel the debt, and that she would be obliged to cancel the debt.

Ah, Mr. President, how different is the statement made by the representative of Italy on this subject, so different, Mr. President, that I am going to take the time of the Senate just a moment to read what the Italian Ambassador to this country had to say about it.

This is an Associated Press dispatch dated Washington, October 11, and it reads:

> Proposals that the United States cancel all allied debts were described as "a vain illusion and useless rhetoric" by Roland Ricci, the Italian ambassador to the United States, in a statement given representatives of the Italian press at Viareggio and cabled to the Italian Embassy here.
> "All attempts to obtain cancellation of the financial obligations made by Europe with the United States will remain a vain illusion and useless rhetoric," the ambassador was quoted as saying: "No American political leader could ever entertain a solution which would be entirely to the advantage of European interests unless he really meant to suppress himself and his party. To forfeit European loans would result in a heavy burden on the United States budget which would signify a greater and heavier taxation on the people. It would seem evident that a much more profitable attitude could be drawn by debtor nations in abstaining from proposing demands that seem impossible for any State to grant."

True words, Mr. President, uttered by this ambassador from Italy, whose country received $1,600,000,000 of those loans. All honor to Italy and her representative. Over three-fourths of the loans are due by three nations—Great Britain, France, and Italy—all of them recovering from the late war, all of them receiving great reparation from Germany, all of them receiving great expansions of trade and commerce because of the war; the United States receiving nothing, the United States having contributed $11,000,000,000 in principal and interest to their preservation, to their enlargement, to their aggrandizement; and yet there are Senators here who scorn to stand up for American rights to collect merely the interest on those sums.

We are taxing the American people as they have never been taxed before in the history of the Republic. The burdens of taxation are greater to-day than ever in its history. If we collect but the interest upon these loans, we will of necessity reduce the taxation upon our own people by one-seventh. If we collect the interest, a taxpayer who now pays $70 would hereafter only pay $60. If he pays $700 now, hereafter he would only pay $600; if he pays $7,000, hereafter he would pay only $6,000; if he pays only $700,000 now, hereafter he would only pay $600,000. It is the best way to reduce the burden of taxation now resting upon the American people.

What are we going to do about it? It is going to be up to the Senate this afternoon to determine this question and determine it according to what is right, according to our written contracts, contracts entered into by this body and the body at the other end of the Capitol and by the President of this Nation. Harsh contracts? No. Exceedingly lenient contracts, contracts that could not have been made with any other Government on earth, contracts under which our allies got dollar for dollar the money which we borrowed from our own people to loan to them, contracts under which they pay in part, only in part, 3½ per cent interest. Is it possible that we are doing them an injustice when we ask them simply to carry out that lenient, easy contract? Why, Mr. President, we do even better than that, and say to them, "You need not pay any interest due in the past; we will just take your bonds for it and you can pay the interest due in the future." How could it be made any easier? How could it be made any simpler? How could it be made any more fair or any more just?

Under these circumstances, I am asking the Senate this afternoon to do what is right toward the American taxpayers who loaned this money. They have some rights. The question is, Are you going to stand up for American rights, or are you going to listen to propaganda and cancel these debts?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment.

When we borrowed that money from them we told them we were going to let our allies have it under these contracts. Why change those contracts now? Why all this secrecy about an attempted settlement? Why not go in a straight, open, fair way and settle according to the contract that has been in existence for five years or more? Why attempt to change the contract now? What forces are at work that will bring it about? What unseen forces are there? What seen forces are there? What forces of any kind are behind this? Why the demand that there should be secret negotiations, behind closed doors, negotiations that the public are not permitted to hear and Congress not permitted to pass upon? The House of Representatives the other day passed a resolution or a bill that provides that five men shall settle the question of this debt and gives them full authority to settle it in any way they see fit. If France wants to pay her debt partially in bonds of the Desert of Sahara, that commission would have the right to take them in part payment under that bill. If they concluded to take reparation bonds of Germany, that commission would have the right to take them. Why do that? Is not the open, fair, and frank way the better? We dealt fairly and frankly with our allies when we loaned them the money. Congress loaned them the money, Congress raised the money, Congress set down the terms upon which we were to lend the money. Why should there be any change at this time? Harsh terms? As I said, no nation under the sun, in the time of war, in the history of the world, ever borrowed money under such favorable terms.

I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask the Senator why he reduces, as his amendment does by its terms, the rate of taxation on corporations? Why does he not simply add his language about the collection of interest on foreign debts without reducing the rate of taxation on corporations?

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not reduce that rate.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood that it did.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the bonds are to be taken upon exactly the same terms.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not understand my question. The amendment reads, "on page 79, line 6, to strike out '15' and insert '10,' and the following." If the Senator will turn to the bill he will find that that is the place where the bill provides for a tax of 15 per cent on corporations. Why does he do that?

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason why that is done is this: The tax on these corporations now is 10 per cent. I am opposed to its increase.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; under the present law they pay an excess-profits tax. The 15 per cent is in lieu of the excess-profits tax, is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. What I propose to do here is this: Instead of raising taxes upon this class of corporations, instead of raising taxes from 10 to 15 per cent, which would amount to about $250,000,000——

Mr. NORRIS. But the tax on corporations is reduced instead of raised.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been reduced in the way of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator proposes to reduce it still further.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me, while the excess-profits tax has been reduced, the 15 per cent is applied to all corporations regardless of whether they make excess profits or not, and the result of that will be that when the excess profits are taken off and when the 5 per cent additional is added there will be an increase very largely of taxes upon a very large portion of our corporations.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, and at the same time the Senator reduces the much larger taxes that must be paid by another block of corporations.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does the Senator put the two together? Why is he going to compel some Senators who are opposed to reducing the taxes on corporations to vote against his amendment on that ground?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it is not necessary. Why not separate the two?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator thinks that should be eliminated and that the wording should be placed in the bill precisely as it is, I shall be glad to accept an amendment to that effect. My purpose is to place the $500,000,000 of taxation where it belongs—on the foreign debtors of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all right.

Mr. McKELLAR. And to relieve the American taxpayers of exactly that much.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will simply add his amendment at the end of some line, or place it anywhere else in the bill, it would be an entirely different proposition from the way he has it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that will obtain the Senator's vote and other Senators do not object to it, I shall be glad to do that. I imagine the Senator from Massachusetts has an objection of that kind to it also from his remarks of a few moments ago. I shall be very glad to accept an amendment of that sort.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator can perfect his amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think he should do so, because as it is now framed he is placing Senators in a position where if they vote to have these bonds procured they also vote to reduce corporate taxes, and they do not wish to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator if it would be satisfactory for me to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know that no one will object to the modified form of the amendment. I ask to add, after line 7, "c" in parentheses and then insert the wording of my amendment. That will introduce it at this point, which is just as good a place as anywhere else.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all right.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator does not need to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I do not, but I would rather ask unanimous consent than to make the motion. I ask unanimous consent for permission to perfect my amendment by adding the letter "c" in parentheses after line 7 and the language of my amendment as perfected.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on that request for unanimous consent I wish to be heard.

Mr. McKELLAR. I eliminate the proposed amendment down to line 1, and that will fix it.

Mr. President, with these remarks I believe I have nothing further to add. I hope my amendment may be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish further to perfect my amendment by striking out, after the word "Government," in line 9, the words "for the moneys loaned under the said act" and substitute therefor "as provided in said act."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me just a moment?

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to proceed, but I yield briefly to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to say just a word with reference to the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], based upon the statement of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], as to the alleged increased national wealth of England, Great Britain, and France after the war. I merely wish to say that I do not believe any nation has profited, materially or otherwise, by the war, or will ever profit by any future war. I must challenge the statement that any nation has gained in national wealth or has been advantaged, materially or otherwise, by the recent war. No longer can war be profitable to any nation, whether it be victorious or vanquished in the conflict—whether it win or lose the fight. Estimates in terms of inflated, depreciated currency of an increase in the value of national assets appear, but we must not lose sight of the terrific addition to indebtedness, the enormously increased encumbrances against those assets and property, caused by the war.

When the balance is taken it will not be found that any gain has accrued to any of the victors, much less to the vanquished in the World War. This is well shown by a brief article appearing in the New York Times about October 11, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A POORER WORLD—BURDEN OF THE WAR NOT SHOWN IN FIGURES OF EXPANDING WEALTH.

To the editor of the New York Times:

The statement in the editorial article, "View of unemployment," printed in last Sunday's issue of your worthy paper, saying "the whole world is hundreds of billions poorer," is quite contradictory to the statement issued by the Savings Banks Association of the State of New York, which reads as follows:

"In 1914 the total estimated wealth of the principal countries involved later in the war was $698,000,000,000. The total aggregate wealth of these same countries to-day is approximately $819,000,000,000, an increase of $121,000,000,000.

"To-day the estimated wealth of the United States is $300,000,000,000, a gain of $50,000,000,000 since 1914. The estimated wealth of Great Britain now is approximately $230,000,000,000, as against $130,000,000,000 when the war started. The wealth of France is now estimated at $100,000,000,000, as against $65,000,000,000 in 1914. Italy and Belgium have added about one-third to their national wealth, while Japan gained about 50 per cent."

It is puzzling to realize that the victorious countries are suffering from unemployment while vanquished Germany is free from it. How does she do it?

L. FENIK.

NEWPORT, R. I., October 11, 1921.

[Estimates of wealth commonly are made in credits, regardless of debits. If it be conceded that the wealth of foreign countries increased $121,000,000,000, it also must be remembered that the national debts put a mortgage on that wealth for more than double that. Under present conditions of exchange no estimate of foreign countries' wealth in dollars is trustworthy. The estimates of the Allies' gain in wealth of property captured from their defeated enemy, Germany, must be deducted from Germany's wealth if added to that of the Allies. Even the solidest gains in wealth are estimated in currencies of reduced purchasing power. And in all cases the disturbance of all values due to the war discounts all future profits in such a manner that it seems indefensible to think that any country on the long look ahead can gain more than it loses through the war, even including the United States, of which that is more true than of any other country. The world probably is gainer through the inestimable worth of the defeat of the ideas represented by Marxism and bolshevism, but that is a moral rather than material gain.—Editor Times.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator this question: The Senator knows that we are to begin to vote at 4 o'clock, and after that time we will only be allowed five minutes to explain an amendment. I have an amendment which I wish to offer, and a very important one, I think, which will take more than five minutes to explain. I wish to inquire if the Senator will probably consume the balance of the time?

Mr. WILLIS. I think I shall not consume more than 10 minutes. I shall have the Senator's request in mind and certainly give him ample time. Indeed, I have the same purpose in addressing the Senate that the Senator from North Carolina has.

There is an amendment here to which I wish to direct the attention of the Senate, an amendment which, as I understand, under the unanimous-consent agreement can not be discussed after 4 o'clock. Therefore I wish to call attention to the amendment proposed by the committee at the bottom of page 79 and the top of page 80 relative to the exemption of domestic building and loan companies from the tax provided under section 230. The present law upon that subject is found in section 231, paragraph 4. Reading the first part of that section, it provides:

> That the following organizations shall be exempt from taxation under this title—

Then, omitting clauses 1, 2, and 3, clause 4 reads:

> Domestic building and loan associations and cooperative banks without capital stock organized and operated for mutual purposes and without profit.

That is the law as it now stands. It has been pretty well adjudicated, though not entirely so. As my colleague pointed out in the statement that he made heretofore on this subject and with which I cordially agree, we in Ohio are very greatly interested in this proposition, because we have a large number of building and loan associations there. As my colleague has also stated, already a case has been practically made up the decision of which will clarify the law entirely and will settle all points in dispute.

At this point in the proceedings the Finance Committee has brought in the amendment to which I have called attention, at the bottom of page 79 to the top of page 80, making the clause read as follows:

> Domestic building and loan associations, substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members.

Senators who were present at that time will recall that when the amendment was reached some time ago both my colleague and myself called attention to it and asked for some explanation of the language. Subsequent to that we made rather a careful investigation in Ohio and consulted with those who would be best acquainted with the probable effect of such an amendment as that. While there was a disposition at first to oppose the amendment, after full investigation and consultation and after considerable effort on the part of my colleague and myself, I think we succeeded in convincing those interested in building and loan associations in Ohio that the original amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was fair and that it ought to be accepted.

Proceeding upon that theory, so far as I am concerned—my colleague will speak for himself—I have written hundreds of letters to people in Ohio who are interested in this question and have advised them that the situation was as I have stated. In fact, after conferring with the members of the committee, I was assured that that was the committee proposition; but I was amazed the other day when we reached this item to find that the committee had prepared still another amendment, entirely out of harmony with the understanding that was previously had. That amendment, which is found in the pamphlet that I hold in my hand, is numbered 16, and reads as follows:

> Page 80, line 1, after the word "members," insert the following: "On the basis of their stock holdings."

So that if this new amendment shall be adopted the language will be as follows:

> Domestic building and loan associations substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members on the basis of their stock holdings.

Mr. President, as I have already stated, my colleague and I had agreed with the people of Ohio who would be particularly affected that the amendment originally proposed by the Committee on Finance would be fair and ought to be accepted. It was accepted; but the additional amendment which is now proposed, if it shall be adopted, will result in the very evil that my colleague pointed out and to which I have sought to direct attention.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Ohio is laboring under a misapprehension as to the existing unanimous-consent agreement. The item on which he is now speaking is under section 231, while the unanimous-consent agreement refers to section 230. I think the Senator will have ample time after we dispose of section 230 to discuss section 231, and he will not then be confined to five minutes as now under the unanimous-consent agreement. I think it would be very much better for the Senator to make his statement when we reach section 231. More than likely, also, there will then be more Senators in the Chamber than are present at this time.

Mr. WILLIS. I am glad the Senator from Utah has called my attention to the unanimous-consent agreement because he also was evidently mistaken about the matter, as we had conferred about it and I understood that the unanimous-consent agreement had reference also to section 231. In view of the Senator's statement, however, that the unanimous-consent agreement applies only to section 230, if any Senator desires to discuss section 230, I am not disposed to interfere. We may take section 231 up later. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to take about seven or eight minutes in order to place in the RECORD a statement showing precisely what would be the result of the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] if it should be adopted by the Senate.

The purpose of the Senator's amendment is to force the distribution of the earnings of corporations. For some reasons, particularly in the past, a law should have been enacted not to force such a distribution but to tax the income or profits of a corporation which were not distributed. However, Mr. President, I am quite sure the Senate will never think of agreeing to the Senator's amendment when they shall have learned just what it means. If the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico were adopted, every corporation in the United States which distributes the full amount of its earnings or profits in any given year would pay no normal tax whatever.

The amendment is offered for the purpose of taking the place of the amendment to this bill which imposes a tax of 15 per cent upon the net gains of corporations. Let me call attention to what the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico will do. On the first 10 per cent of the net gains of corporations the Senator proposes to impose a tax of 8 per cent. I will now take a corporation or company having a net income of $100,000, by way of illustration, in order to show the results which would follow the adoption of his amendment. Ten per cent on $100,000 of net income is $10,000, and 8 per cent of that is $800, which would be the tax that the corporation would pay if it retained 10 per cent of its profits in its treasury or did not distribute the same.

The next bracket is 16 per cent on the 10 per cent additional profits retained, which would amount to $1,600; the next is 24 per cent, which would amount to $2,400; the next is 32 per cent, which would amount to $3,200; the next is 40 per cent, which would amount to $4,000; the next is 48 per cent, which would amount to $4,800; and 56 per cent on the remainder, or 40 per cent, would be $22,400. That is the result in percentages and amounts.

On the other hand, suppose the corporation distributed 90 per cent of its income; in that event its taxes, of course, would be $800. If there was distributed 80 per cent, the taxes would be $2,400; if a corporation distributed 70 per cent of its earnings, the tax would be $4,800; if it distributed 60 per cent, the tax would be $8,000; if it distributed 50 per cent, the tax would be $12,000; if it distributed 40 per cent, the tax would be $16,800; if it distributed 30 per cent, the tax would be $22,400; if it distributed 20 per cent, the tax would be $28,000; if they distributed 10 per cent, the tax would be $32,600; and if they did not distribute anything at all, the tax would be $39,200. In other words, Mr. President, if there was no distribution, the tax would be 39.2 per cent; if there was a distribution of 40 per cent, the tax would be 16.8 per cent. The Senate can judge from these amounts as to what the taxes would be in the case of corporations with greater earnings.

The real result, Mr. President, of the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, if adopted, would be to penalize the small business and relieve large business from the corporation tax. Let me call attention to the situation existing to-day, and which I suppose will always exist in this country and in every other country.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think it advisable at this juncture to say to the Senator that if the earnings were distributed, then the individual taxpayer in many cases would pay taxes at a much higher rate than that specified in the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. But many individuals receiving dividends would not pay any taxes at all on account of the individual exemption.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is true; but I will state to the Senator that while the amendment proposed by me would relieve from any tax those corporations which distribute all of their income, yet the income which would be paid by the individual stockholders upon the dividends so distributed would raise as much revenue from the earnings of corporations as the proposed bill now before the Senate would raise.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no time to explain how easily the proposed tax could be avoided, but there is no question that the Government of the United States would never receive the taxes under the proposed amendment that would be received under the 15 per cent tax proposed by the committee.

I have made the statement that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico would penalize the small business and relieve large business of taxation. We all know that a corporation starting out with a hundred thousand dollars capital or fifty thousand dollars, if it is to grow at all, if it is going to expand—and all large business in this country began in a small way—has got to keep in the business a part of its profits. If it does not do that it is impossible for it to expand, and sooner or later failure will follow. Upon the other hand, Mr. President, the Steel Corporation, for instance, which has all the capital it needs, could declare dividends under this amendment up to 100 per cent of their net income during the year and escape taxation. It is true that when the dividends were declared, as is the case to-day, the individual receiving the income would pay an individual income tax; but the result would be that thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of stockholders in such concerns would receive their dividends, and, after receiving the dividends, would not be compelled to pay one cent under the income tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Does the Senator think they ought to?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think the corporation ought to pay a tax before distribution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then why have you an exemption for individual incomes derived outside of corporations? Why do you exempt that class of individuals and make it up by penalizing and taxing those unfortunates who happen to have small incomes from corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the corporation pays the tax, and it ought to pay some tax; and it has been stated time and time again here upon the floor why it should pay. Corporations receive the protection of the Government of the United States, not only on the individual incomes that the stockholders receive, but they receive its protection as corporations, and they ought to be taxed; and, as far as I am concerned, I shall vote that they shall be taxed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I make a further suggestion to the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In the case just mentioned by the Senator, we could remedy that by having the corporation pay a franchise tax. On the other point, the Senator probably does not recall that I said that if my amendment should be adopted I proposed to offer another amendment providing that those corporations might issue interest-bearing scrip dividends which would be taxed in the hands of the stockholder and enable the newly organized corporation to accumulate more capital and keep it in its business and not pay the excessive tax rates.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be just one way of evading the tax. There is not any doubt about that. I had that very thing in mind when I spoke of the evasion of this tax, and that plan would allow evasion. If that were put into force, and if that could be done as suggested by the Senator from New Mexico, we would get practically no revenue from this source. It is true that we would get whatever tax there might be upon the interest that would be collected from the certificates, if above the amount of exemption, but what would the interest upon the dividends that would be declared amount to?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; the whole scrip dividend would be considered as income to the individual taxpayer, and the experts will tell the Senator that if it is all distributed, you will get more revenue than you will get under the present bill, even though none were distributed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think I know about what the incomes of the corporations in the country are as well as the experts do. I think I know about the way they are distributed, too, as well as they do, and I think I know what the law taxing those incomes is as well as they do; and I think, Mr. President, that the statement I make here is absolutely correct, because of the fact that past experience has demonstrated that it is the relatively small corporation that does not distribute its earnings. It retains them, or part of them, for the very purpose of extending its business; and that is the only way, perhaps, in which it can extend its business; and if it is profitable as a result of the efforts of the man who stands at the head, through his personal endeavors and perhaps through the cooperation of two or three others who do all or almost all of the work, outside of the common labor, I say that that institution ought to have a chance to grow and increase, and not be taxed 39.2 per cent, as this proposal would tax it if it kept all of its earnings.

I do not think we need worry about undistributed earnings for this year or for a few years to come. Very few corporations in the United States will make a profit more than sufficient to pay their regular dividends for the year 1921, and where one company will do it, I predict now that a thousand companies will not do it. During war times, when profits were made such as were never known before in all the history of the world, when the profiteer was found upon all hands and all sides, including the Government of the United States itself, there may have been some reason for taxing undistributed earnings; but just as surely as we stand here to-day there is not much danger of undistributed earnings for the year 1921 and, I think, for a number of years to come.

Mr. President, I promised the Senator from North Carolina that I would speak but eight minutes, and I have occupied the floor for ten minutes. I shall now yield, although there are a number of other matters that I desired to take up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when we passed the last revenue act the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] brought to the attention of the Senate the very same question that he has raised to-day. The Senator then made it perfectly manifest that the undistributed earnings of corporations were escaping surtaxes and that the amount involved was very large. He made it clear that the income tax as among individuals, partnerships, and corporations was very unequal and very discriminatory in favor of corporations. The Senator's position was invulnerable at that time but for the fact that that bill imposed upon corporations an excess-profits tax while it exempted individuals and corporations from that tax. The answer which we made to the Senator at that time and which I think was accepted by the Senate as probably conclusive was that this exemption on the part of the individual and the partnership from the excess-profits tax would equalize the difference in the taxes of these three groups of taxpayers.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SIMMONS. It will take all of my time for me to say what I have in mind.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Just a word.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. I will state that I am not going to antagonize the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that, but I want to correct a wrong inference to be drawn from what the Senator has just said.

When I proposed a tax upon undistributed incomes that related to the bill of 1917, which imposed an excess-profits tax on individuals, partnerships, and corporations all alike. The next year, in the law of 1918, the Senator, as chairman of the committee, very wisely advocated taking that tax off of individuals and partnerships, and making a discrimination. I did not press my provision then, when the excess-profits tax applied to corporations and did not apply to individuals and partnerships.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the way in which we met the contention of the Senator, which, in my judgment, was unanswerable from every other standpoint. Now, Mr. President, we have taken from corporations the excess-profits tax, and the discrimination of which the Senator from New Mexico complains is restored in all of its vigor and force.

I have had the actuary of the Treasury make me a table showing the different percentages of income taxes that individuals, partnerships, and corporations will pay under the bill as it stands to-day. The table shows that an individual will pay upon an income of a million dollars 38.85 per cent; a partnership with eight partners will pay 30.78 per cent; a partnership with five partners will pay 34.23 per cent. A corporation which distributes 75 per cent of its earnings and has 20 stockholders will pay only 20.39 per cent; and let me say that that includes not only the flat tax but the estimated surtax upon that distribution.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be in case all the 20 stockholders owned the same amount of stock.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. So, Mr. President, under the bill we are about to pass, with a 15 per cent flat rate upon corporations, with the privilege of reserving undistributed 25 per cent or more of their earnings if they see fit—and upon an average I understand that they do reserve 25 per cent undistributed—the corporation will pay an income tax only about one-half of what the individual will pay and only about two-thirds of what a partnership will pay upon the same earnings.

Under these circumstances, to permit corporations to withdraw from the tax the 25 per cent which they, on an average, retain and never distribute, is, to my mind, an unthinkable thing. Instead of adding to this discrimination we ought to seek to reduce this discrimination in favor of corporations. They are not paying to-day any more than their fair share of the taxes of the United States; and after we have relieved them of $400,000,000 of their taxes and substituted only about $267,000,000 of other taxes, resulting in a net reduction to the corporations of over $100,000,000, it seems to me that they ought not to complain if we say, "With reference to your income, you shall be put upon the same footing as an individual or a partnership." An individual or a partnership must pay taxes upon his or their total income. They can not retain one dollar of it as undistributed, and thereby escape surtaxes. Whether, as the Senator from New Mexico very forcefully said, his earnings are in money or are locked up in commodities, they are taken as distributed, and he must pay the flat normal tax and the surtax upon them. Why should a corporation with this differential in its favor be permitted to retain part of its income and not pay any surtax at all?

I have here the statement made to me to-day of the Actuary of the Treasury, an estimate made by him at my request, and he advises me in this estimate that, after taking everything into consideration, it is absolutely safe to say that since 1917, when we first imposed these war taxes, the corporations, through the withdrawal of their undistributed incomes, have escaped taxation to the extent of $810,000,000.

He estimates that for the year 1920 they escape taxes to the extent of $150,000,000, a taxation which, under similar circumstances and conditions, an individual would have been compelled to pay. I think it is indefensible, Mr. President, that we should not take some action to relieve against this situation. I do not want to make the corporation distribute all their earnings. I think that would be a very bad thing. I think the retaining of part of the earnings for the purpose of expansion, development, improvement, and all that sort of thing is admirable and necessary to good business; but a citizen has to do that, and an ordinary taxpayer engaged in business does that every year, and pays this tax. Why should not the corporation pay it in some form or other?

I dislike very much to say it, but I am afraid the proposition of the Senator from New Mexico goes a little further than I wished to go, because his proposition involves a removal of the entire flat tax of 15 per cent and the substitution of a graduated tax upon corporations. I do not know where that would lead. I have not had time to consider it, and I am a little apprehensive about it.

Mr. President, I want to be on the safe side, and I have an amendment here which I propose to offer which I think is absolutely fair. I will let the clerk read it in a little while, but before he reads it I want to say that it is an attempt on my part to impose what is tantamount to a graduated surtax upon that part of the earnings of corporations which is not distributed. It does not disturb any other part of the scheme, but by it I seek to impose a moderate surtax upon that part of the earnings which are undistributed.

I am told by the Actuary of the Treasury that the proposition embraced in my amendment would result in an average additional tax, by way of surtax upon the undistributed earnings, of 9 and a fraction per cent. But he advises me at the same time that if that tax were added to the 15 per cent, making 24 per cent, and were distributed among the stockholders, the flat tax and the surtax would run it up to 31 per cent. If it is distributed among the stockholders, as it ought to be to insure equality, the average tax would be 31 per cent.

So, Mr. President, there will be no additional incentive for a corporation to distribute its earnings; nothing would be gained. There is some inducement now to a corporation to retain whatever may reasonably be required for the conduct and the expansion and the development of the business, because nothing would be gained by distributing when by distributing the stockholder would have to pay 31 per cent as against 24 per cent if the earnings were not distributed.

I do not desire to see an amendment agreed to which would impose such an additional tax upon the undistributed earnings as would make it impracticable for corporations to follow the old and wise practice of retaining a part of the earnings for the purposes of development. I do not think it is a bad business policy, but because it is a good policy to pursue in business is no sufficient reason why they should be exempt from taxes which all the balance of the citizens of this country pay.

Mr. President, the time has about arrived for a vote, and I suppose there are some other Senators who may want to make statements. I ask that the Secretary read the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield just a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator make any provision that when dividends withheld from distribution are distributed to the stockholders they shall then be exempt from taxation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not; but I will accept an amendment to that effect.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is not such an amendment added there will be double taxation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not made that provision, but I said to the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who spoke to me about it, that I had considered it.

Mr. REED. If it is to be put in, can it not be put in now?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I have no objection to it. Mr. President, I will amend the amendment by adding a clause to the effect that if such taxed income is hereafter distributed it shall be exempt from surtaxes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment, with the suggested change.

The READING CLERK. On page 79, after line 7, insert the following:

(c) That beginning January 1, 1922, there shall be imposed upon every corporation upon the undistributed income of the preceding year remaining on hand when it makes its annual return for income tax a tax at the following rates:

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 5 per cent and less than 11 per cent of the total net income, 5 per cent; on the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 10 per cent and less than 26 per cent of the total net income, 10 per cent; on the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 25 per cent and less than 51 per cent of the total net income, 15 per cent; on the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 50 per cent of the total net income, 20 per cent: Provided, That any portion of the undistributed income so taxed and hereafter distributed shall be exempt from any further surtax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to say, in conclusion, that I shall not offer that amendment until there is action upon the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico. However, Mr. President, I do desire to say that I am informed by the actuary that this amendment would raise $60,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, am I right in assuming that this tax on the undistributed income applies only to that which may be earned during the current year; in other words, that it would not apply to an accumulated surplus which may have been earned in previous years?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; that is the meaning of it—that beginning on January 1, 1922, there shall be imposed upon every corporation upon the undistributed income of the preceding year remaining on hand when it makes its annual return for income tax, taxation at the rates mentioned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to what I think is an error in these brackets. The amendment reads:

On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 5 per cent and less than 11 per cent of the total net income, 5 per cent.

On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 10 per cent and less than 26 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. What figure does the Senator propose to insert; 10 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is what it ought to be.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then insert it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is one per cent that would draw 5 per cent in one case and 10 per cent in another.

Mr. SIMMONS. I originally had it with the figure the Senator suggests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to give the Senate the benefit of some figures which may help a little in seeing the importance of this amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. To which amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. REED. Each of them—the Jones amendment and the Simmons amendment. The United States Steel Corporation has an outstanding capital stock, omitting all but the millions, preferred stock, $508,000,000; common stock, $360,000,000. Its dividends for 1920 were $50,000,000. Its surplus was $664,000,000.

In addition to that, the company expended in the acquisition of new properties $104,000,000, and carried into one sinking fund $40,000,000, carried into another fund by the acquisition of new properties $30,000,000, and then they charged the proportional cost of war facilities installments of $30,000,000. It seems to me that sort of disposition of assets ought to be reached.

The Woolworth Co. is a very interesting example. Its preferred stock is $12,000,000, its common stock $65,000,000, its dividends on the preferred stock $857,500, and on the common stock $4,600,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the hour of 4 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. REED. I call attention to the fact that I have five minutes to talk on the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Was the amendment offered to-day?

Mr. REED. It is the pending amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no. If there is to be an honorable observance of the agreement, evasion of it, I particularly stated yesterday, ought not be tolerated.

Mr. REED. I do not understand the Senator. I am not trying to evade anything.

Mr. PENROSE. It looks to me very much as if the Senator was.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think there is a misunderstanding between the two Senators about this fact. The Senator from Missouri has five minutes on any amendment offered after 4 o'clock, not before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived the unanimous consent agreement goes into effect. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will withhold that for a moment. I want to settle this question.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well.

Mr. REED. I have been accused of bad faith. Let us see. What is the situation? Is this question open now for five minutes' debate or not?

Mr. PENROSE. No; it is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will read from the unanimous-consent agreement, as follows:

Provided, That any Senator proposing an amendment after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. may explain the same for a period not exceeding five minutes.

Mr. REED. All debate then ceases?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. REED. Then permit me to say, in view of the slight charge my friend makes, that I have not even read the unanimous-consent agreement and I did not happen to be in the Chamber at the time it was entered into. I supposed the question was open for five minutes debate by any Senator, but if it is the ruling of the Chair that it is not, and the language seems to be plain, I have no desire to take the time of the Senate now. I shall present these figures a little later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I propose to modify or amend my amendment in order to put it in a little more popular language. The language which the expert prepared was very accurate, but the modifying clause is on the back of the printed sheet, and it requires a good deal of analysis to understand it. In order to get it in plainer and more popular language, I offer the following as a change. It is the same language substantially, but stated in a different way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The modified amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 79, line 1, after the word "tax," strike out all down to and including line 7, and insert:

Equal to the sum of the following:

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes not more than 10 per cent of the total income, 8 per cent;

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 10 per cent and not more than 20 per cent of the total net income, 16 per cent;

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 20 per cent and not more than 30 per cent of the total net income, 24 per cent;

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 30 per cent and not more than 40 per cent of the total net income, 32 per cent;

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 40 per cent and not more than 50 per cent of the total net income, 40 per cent;

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I merely desire to state——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. REED. The point of order is that this amendment can not be discussed by anyone.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator had better read the unanimous-consent agreement before consuming the time of the Senate with frivolous points of order. I have a right under the unanimous consent——

Mr. REED. I ask for the ruling of the Chair on my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. REED. The point of order is that no one can speak after 4 o'clock except to explain an amendment offered after 4 o'clock, the agreement clearly referring to the Senator offering the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will read the rest of the clause in the unanimous-consent agreement:

And that a Member of the Committee on Finance may have a like period of time in which to make reply.

Mr. REED. I still stand on the point of order. "A like period of time to make reply." There has been no speech made yet in explanation, and therefore there is nothing to reply to.

Mr. PENROSE. I will not try the Senator's impatience unduly. I only wish to say that this amendment——

Mr. REED. I am going to stand upon my right here. The Senator compelled me to take my seat when I only intended to occupy three minutes. If I was not entitled to the floor the Senator is not, and if the Senator is entitled to the floor I am, and if I am entitled to the floor, I have no objection to the Senator having it.

Mr. PENROSE. I am entitled to the floor, and I intend to maintain it. If the Senator from Missouri intends to shirk and evade the honorable obligations of a unanimous-consent agreement, we will have to make them more specific hereafter when he is present in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I stand here now on a question of personal privilege. I say that the Senator from Pennsylvania has no right to accuse me of trying to evade any honorable obligation. I hope that my sense of honor is quite as high as the sense of honor possessed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have already stated that I was not here when the unanimous-consent agreement was made, that I had not even read it——

Mr. PENROSE. That is evident.

Mr. REED. And it is quite evident that the Senator from Pennsylvania has not read it or could not apprehend it if he did read it.

Mr. PENROSE. I framed it.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not understand it evidently, or he would not be trying to talk now. I ask for a ruling whether the Senator from Pennsylvania has a right to the floor, and if he has, I shall claim it on an equally high right.

Mr. PENROSE. That question can be raised when I am through.

Mr. REED. No; it will be raised now.

Mr. PENROSE. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The wording of the unanimous-consent agreement is—

That a member of the Committee on Finance may have a like period of time in which to make reply.

That refers to the foregoing, which reads:

That any Senator proposing an amendment after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. may explain the same for a period not exceeding five minutes.

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico is a new amendment, proposed after 4 o'clock, the Senator from Pennsylvania has the right to five minutes to reply to it. If it is merely a modification or change of some amendment that was proposed before 4 o'clock, then there is no time for the Senator from Pennsylvania or any other Member of the committee to make any reply to it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I may be incorrectly informed, but my information is that the Senator from New Mexico offered his corrected amendment after 4 o'clock and explained it, and that would entitle a member of the committee to five minutes to make reply.

Mr. REED. I call for the ruling of the Chair, taking into consideration the suggestion just made and the further language of the agreement:

Provided, That any Senator proposing an amendment after the said hour of 4 o'clock p. m. may explain the same for a period not exceeding five minutes, and that a member of the Committee on Finance may have a like period of time in which to make reply.

That is, to reply to a speech of explanation, to a speech in favor of an amendment. The question is not to be determined as to whether a new amendment is offered. If a new amendment is offered, but is not explained, then there is nothing to reply to, and I insist that that did not take place in any event. The Senator from New Mexico did not undertake to speak to his amendment and therefore there is nothing to reply to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have the floor I believe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from New Mexico in presenting his amendment made some explanation of it, and that therefore the Senator from Pennsylvania has the right to reply to it.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, my reply is that the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Mexico, in my opinion, does not carry out the purpose he has in mind and would be more disastrous to the business prosperity of the country than his first amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I believe I am now entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. The Chair has ruled that the Senator from New Mexico made a speech and that under the unanimous-consent agreement any member of the Finance Committee can speak in reply. I am a member of the Finance Committee and I now address myself in reply.

In reply, I say that the Woolworth Co. had a preferred capital stock of $12,000,000, common stock of $65,000,000, paid out dividends in 1920 of $857,500 on the preferred stock and $4,600,000 on the common stock, and has a surplus of $14,361,366. The authority, Poor's Manual, states that $15,000,000 represented real assets and $50,000,000 represented good will, and yet this company has accumulated now as a surplus more than its real original assets.

The American Tobacco Co., with an outstanding capital of preferred stock $52,699,700 and common stock $89,542,600, declared dividends in 1920 of $12,558,778, and as a surplus it carried $14,655,900.

The American Cigar Co., with a capital of $25,000,000, declared dividends of $1,400,000 and carries a surplus of $9,308,584.

The Mengel Co., with a capital of $8,124,200, declared dividends of $300,000 and carries a surplus of $1,877,033. That company is owned by the American Tobacco Co., as is also the American Cigar Co., and their aggregate surplus is $25,841,517 and their aggregate dividends were $14,258,778 and their capital, which is largely water, is $175,336,500.

The Anaconda Copper Co. has a capital outstanding of $116,562,500. Dividends were paid of $6,993,750 and a surplus exists of $84,753,462. The same authority states that this company in 1920 showed total receipts of $101,610,254; that they charged themselves with various accounts, but that after making every deduction they could think of they still had this enormous surplus remaining on hand. Among other things they charge a reserve for depreciation of $5,000,000 each year.

The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey had outstanding a capital, common and preferred, of $295,014,900 and paid dividends of $33,435,022. It has a surplus of $373,082,254. This company carried on its books a large surplus under the head of "Surplus affiliated companies" which amounted to $219,064,671, making a total surplus of $592,146,925.

According to Poor's Industrials the figures given by the subsidiary and affiliated companies show that the Standard Oil Co. has diminished its account "Surplus affiliated companies" by $214,987,643, leaving this company in the possession of $807,134,568 of surplus.

In 1919 the Standard Oil Co. paid dividends of $21,218,559 and in 1920 paid dividends of $33,435,022, an increase in 1920 of $11,216,463. In 1920 the Standard Oil Co. carried a reserve for taxes of $15,250,000 and its affiliated companies a reserve of $13,651,481.

Mr. President, those are some of the companies carrying enormous surpluses which will escape any surtaxes as the bill is now framed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I am not able to secure a transfer at this time and therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. In his absence, and not being able to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I have not been able to secure a transfer of that pair and therefore can not vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. Not being able to secure a transfer of that pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is necessarily detained from the Senate, is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I find I can transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I make that transfer and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. The Senator from Utah is absent on account of official business.

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Not being able to secure a transfer of the pair, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer of the pair and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 45, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read the amendment which I have heretofore submitted to the amendment reported by the committee. I now offer the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 79, after line 7, it is proposed to insert the following:

(c) That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, directed, and instructed at the earliest practicable moment to secure from the several foreign Governments, namely, Belgium, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Liberia, Rumania, Russia, and Serbia, to which Governments moneys were loaned by the United States, under and by virtue of several war emergency acts of Congress, passed in the years 1917 and 1918, long-time interest-bearing bonds of such Governments as provided in said acts, the interest on such bonds to be paid by said Governments semiannually at rates not less than those fixed in said acts.

That in making settlements with the several foreign Governments aforesaid the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to take interest-bearing bonds for the past-due interest on said loans and the future interest up to January 1, 1922, such bonds to be of like tenor and effect as the bonds for the principal loaned to said Governments, and the interest thereon to be paid semiannally in like manner.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure from such foreign Governments as may be indebted to the United States, of like tenor and effect and of like rates of interest and payable in like manner, for the following indebtedness: (1) Obligations received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war material; (2) obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation; (3) obligations received by the Treasurer from the American relief administration; (4) obligations due the United States on any other account from such foreign nations.

The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure bonds, of like tenor and effect and like rates of interest, for the indebtedness due the United States from the following nations: Armenia, Austria, Esthonia, Finland, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, and Poland.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept, in addition to said bonds, any securities from such foreign Governments as collateral and as a guaranty of the prompt payment of said bonds and interest thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to make an explanation in reference to the amendment. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggested that there might be some doubt about whether we ought to strike out the "15 per cent" and insert "10 per cent" as provided in the amendment when first proposed. Therefore I have perfected the amendment so as to provide simply for the funding of the foreign indebtedness into bonds under the acts of 1917 and 1918, including the past due interest up to January 21, 1922. So there is no question of revenue in regard to the amendment except increased revenue; in other words, if the interest is collected, we shall increase the revenue by $500,000,000 a year. I hope the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the matters referred to in the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee are being amply provided for in a separate bill which has been introduced in the Senate, reported from the committee, and is now on the calendar of the Senate awaiting consideration and possibly amendment at an early opportunity. Likewise, a measure relating to the foreign debt, I am informed, has already passed the House and is now before the Senate Committee on Finance.

I do not see any useful purpose to be gained by complicating the pending revenue bill, which is tremendous enough at best, by introducing the question of the foreign debt of the United States. There is trouble enough about the revenue bill without incurring delay and complication by adding anything regarding the matter referred to in the amendment now proposed. I shall not attempt to discuss the merits of that amendment; they will be amply discussed at the very earliest opportunity, and I am only sorry that we have not been able to do so before this time. The Secretary of the Treasury and others have had very prolonged hearings on the foreign debt before the committees of the Senate and the House. These matters will be acted on very soon and are entirely separate from the purposes to be carried out in the revenue bill. The trouble with a revenue measure is that it seems to be made a kind of a carryall for any amendment that a Senator may have in his mind for the reformation of the community; and I sincerely hope that this measure can be kept clear and clean of all collateral matters which ought to be taken up at the proper time and in the proper way and on their own merits.

I sincerely hope, therefore, that regardless of any merits involved in any proposition relating to the debt, and regardless of the views of any individual Senator, this amendment will not be added to the bill to embarrass and delay it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I propose an amendment. On page 2, line 22, after the word "any," I move to insert the word "other," so that it will read:

Any other securities.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ASHURST. Am I in order to be heard on my amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not understood. There is no word "any" in that line.

Mr. ASHURST. I mean in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. I probably had better make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair first and ascertain if it is in order to propose an amendment to the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, Mr. President, on page 2, line 22, according to the print that I have, after the word "any," I propose to insert the word "other," so that it will read:

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept, in addition to said bonds, any other—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not seem to have the same amendment that has been proposed.

Mr. ASHURST. There are two different copies of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the word to which the Senator refers is on page 3, line 4.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is important to sound a warning now to the American people that some events are transpiring in Europe similar to things that transpired in Europe in the fall of 1912 and the year 1913.

In August, 1912, the Sixty-second Congress passed a bill providing that coastwise ships belonging to the United States should pass through the Panama Canal free from tolls. Immediately after President Taft had signed that bill a propaganda gigantic in its proportions and insidious in its character was begun in Europe to try to convince the American people that their Congress had done wrong.

I regret to say that that European propaganda was successful and that, aided by the transcontinental railroads at home, Europeans succeeded in amending the act of August 24, 1912, which provided for free transit, so that for practical purposes Great Britain told the Congress of the United States what to do upon that occasion. I now sound a warning that precisely the same sort of propaganda is going around in Europe to induce the American Congress to remit, cancel, and forgive the indebtedness for moneys loaned by the United States to our allies in the World War.

If I had the time I could read to Senators speech after speech, article after article, in the public press showing that it is a part and parcel of British diplomacy to bring about a cancellation, remission, and forgiveness of the debts that foreign Governments owe to the United States for moneys loaned. It is time for Americans to be on guard so that we may not be hereafter accused of violating our promises.

It is time for all Senators, Representatives, and American citizens everywhere to say that by no expression, by no intendment, by no interpretation, by no use of words or failure to use words shall it hereafter be said that we agreed, diplomatically or otherwise, to cancel this indebtedness.

As a sample of how the English people—and they are a great people—view us diplomatically, let me read from the World's Work of September, 1921, how the propaganda for the Panama Canal free-transit repeal was begun.

In a letter to Col. House, from a man whom I admired during his lifetime and whose memory I now revere, the writer, Mr. Page, our ambassador, says, at page 447:

Sometimes I hear criticisms, now and then more or less serious ones. Much of it comes of our greenness; some of it from the very nature of the situation. Those who expect to find us brilliant are, of course, disappointed.

Mr. President, we may be "green," we may lack "brilliancy" as a people, but I think we have a sturdy sense of honor and a sound patriotism, and we are going to say at all places and at all times that we do not intend under any circumstances to remit or cancel the sums of money loaned to foreign Governments.

The Machiavelian statesmen in the Old World are trying to lead some people to believe or to pretend that they believe we may some time cancel this debt. The American Congress in my judgment can not say too often, can never say too emphatically that we are opposed to the cancellation of this debt, but that we demand that both principal and the interest shall be paid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Arizona has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, exercising the doubtful right which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asserted, that a member of the Finance Committee may use some time, I want to say just one word.

The magnitude of this subject, regardless of the merits of the proposition, is so great that it ought to be dealt with separately, as suggested by the chairman of the Finance Committee. It is a matter that ought not to be involved in this bill; and I do not think the amendment ought to be adopted, regardless of whatever merit it may have.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Tennessee accept my amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept it, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on adopting the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize that I have no right to speak, and I do not intend to do so. I simply want to call the attention of the proponent of this amendment to what seems to me to be an error on page 2, in the second paragraph. Evidently it is his intention to receive bonds for obligations held by the Secretary of War. He has not included the word "bonds" at all in that section, and then it provides that these bonds are to be received for the following indebtedness:

(1) Obligations received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war material.

It seems to me that he intends to have that read "obligations received by the Secretary of War and by the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have no desire to be captious about this matter, but we have adopted a rule. Let us abide by it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the amendment is perfectly clear as it is. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	Moses	Shortridge
Brandegee	Gooding	Myers	Simmons
Broussard	Harreld	Nelson	Smoot
Bursum	Harris	New	Stanfield
Calder	Heflin	Newberry	Sutherland

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to perfect my amendment by adding the word "bonds" after the words "United States," in line 13, on page 2. I think that can be interlined without taking formal action on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee as modified.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I would be very glad if the Chair would let the amendment which I offered be called up now. I think I shall have to leave the Chamber in a very short time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 79, after line 7, insert the following:

(c) That, beginning January 1, 1922, there shall be imposed upon every corporation upon the undistributed income of the preceding year remaining on hand when it makes its annual return for income tax a tax at the following rates:

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 5 per cent and less than 10 per cent of the total net income, 5 per cent.

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 10 per cent and less than 25 per cent of the total net income, 10 per cent.

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 25 per cent and less than 50 per cent of the total net income, 15 per cent.

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 50 per cent of the total net income, 20 per cent.

Provided, That portions of the undistributed income so taxed and hereafter distributed shall be exempt from any further surtax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). By arrangement with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who has a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] and vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], who has a general pair with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and vote "yea."

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). I make the same announcement I made before, that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to make the same announcement as on the last vote, that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent on official business, and is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I propose the following amendment: On page 79, line 6, I move to strike out the numerals "15" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "10," and after the word "amount," on line 7, to strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following:

On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes not more than 10 per cent of the total net income, 4 per cent;
On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 10 per cent and not more than 20 per cent of the total net income, 18 per cent;
On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 20 per cent and not more than 30 per cent of the total net income, 12 per cent;
On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 30 per cent and not more than 40 per cent of the total net income, 16 per cent;
On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 40 per cent and not more than 50 per cent of the total net income, 20 per cent;
On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 50 per cent and not more than 60 per cent of the total net income, 24 per cent;
On the undistributed net income so far as the same constitutes more than 60 per cent of the total net income, 28 per cent.

Mr. President, I desire to say just a word in regard to this amendment. I have not sought to do anything more than to bring about equality in taxation. The bill as it is framed by the committee will exempt from taxation a very large amount of the net income of the country. Its operation as to the incomes of the country will be to an extreme degree unequal. The bill as reported by the committee without amendment in this particular, in my opinion, is utterly indefensible. It will make of these corporations the repositories of all of the net income which seeks to evade just taxation; it will drive every individual engaged in business and every partnership engaged in business, having a net income of any considerable amount, into incorporating, and it will be found that the total taxes upon those corporations will in any event be only 15 per cent, whereas if those earnings were distributed they would pay the surtaxes in the cases where high surtaxes should be paid.

It is the closely held corporations which will take advantage of this very situation. There is no reason why every individual and every partnership should not incorporate, keep all of its earnings in the corporation, and evade any tax beyond 15 per cent, and I want to reiterate that, in my humble judgment, if we adopt the scheme reported by a majority of the Finance Committee, we will jeopardize the taxes which Senators expect the Government to receive from individual incomes. Everybody who pays a high individual income tax, or a high surtax, will incorporate his business and will find a means of keeping all of his earnings, beyond his necessary living expenses, in the business and evade any taxation beyond 15 per cent.

I wish Senators would ponder upon the direful result which is going to come from the passage of the bill without an amendment to this provision. Under my amendment, I reduce the flat tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent, which is the flat tax on the earnings of corporations now, whether distributed or undistributed, and I put a graduated surtax upon that part of the net income which remains undistributed.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] left the flat tax at 15 per cent, where the committee proposed to have it. My amendment would reduce that to 10 per cent and add one-half of the surtaxes proposed in my former amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let the amendment be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 79, line 6, strike out "15" and insert "10," and at the end of line 7 insert:

And also the following:
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitute not more than 10 per cent of the total net income, 4 per cent.
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 10 per cent and not more than 20 per cent of the total net income, 8 per cent.
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 20 per cent and not more than 30 per cent of the total net income, 12 per cent.
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 30 per cent and not more than 40 per cent of the total net income, 16 per cent.
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 40 per cent and not more than 50 per cent of the total net income, 20 per cent.
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 50 per cent and not more than 60 per cent of the total net income, 24 per cent.
On the undistributed net income, so far as the same constitutes more than 60 per cent of the total net income, 28 per cent.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand the Chair has been ruling that we can demand a separate vote on these various amendments without giving notice to that effect?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They can be reoffered in the Senate. No notice is required. Such notice is required in some other parliamentary bodies, but not in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, by the unanimous-consent agreement it was agreed that I might offer my amendment to the amendment of the committee at a later time. I propose to offer it to-morrow. I should like to inquire if the section can be agreed to, subject to action upon the amendment which I shall offer and have pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section can be agreed to in Committee of the Whole and the Senator's amendment can be offered when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think we might by unanimous consent allow the final approval of the section to go over until to-morrow and proceed with other matters in the bill, with the understanding that there is only one amendment to be offered to it, and that is the amendment which I propose to offer.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on account of the great confusion which prevails in the Chamber, I confess I do not quite understand what the Senator from Massachusetts desires.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The question comes now upon the approval of the committee amendment to this section.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If that is approved, I would be shut out and no opportunity given to offer the amendment which I propose to offer to the section. It has been agreed that I may offer it to-morrow. Therefore, I ask that action on this section may go over until to-morrow, with the understanding that only the amendment which I have to present will be offered.

Mr. PENROSE. Why can not that amendment be offered now?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought it was agreed that it would not be discussed until to-morrow. It will take some time, and we were going to let it remain for discussion to-morrow and take up other matters this evening.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator understand that that was a part of the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; I do, because I especially requested that I be not asked to go on to-day on account of the condition of my throat.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not understand that there was an agreement that it should go over entirely, but that it should be exempted from the five-minute rule.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My amendment is expressly excluded from the language of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was the understanding that the agreement should not apply to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why not let this section be passed over with the understanding that the only action upon it will be action upon my amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. Is not the Senator in shape to address the Senate to-night on the subject?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am really not. I do not see how there can be any possible delay if it is understood that the only amendment which will be offered to this section is the amendment I propose to offer. We can proceed to other parts of the bill, then, to-night.

Mr. PENROSE. Is that understood?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly it is understood. Every amendment to the section has been disposed of except mine under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Missouri understand it that way?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I decline to answer any question that is asked for any such purpose.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not imagine it would fortify the agreement any. I only made the inquiry.

Mr. REED. What is that? What was it the Senator said?

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts state to the Senate and for my particular information just what he desires in connection with his amendment and the disposition of this question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 79 strike out lines 6 and 7 and substitute the following:

(b) For each calendar year thereafter 10 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income does not exceed $100,000; 15 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $300,000; and 20 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that action upon that amendment and the section to which it relates be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. To be open to debate by the whole Senate?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly. It is a very important amendment. There is a great deal of sentiment in favor of it and undoubtedly some strong sentiment against it. It is one of the most important amendments, I think, that has been offered. If there were not other matters to be taken up to-night, other matters in the bill to be acted upon, I would not make the request. It is simply asking postponement for a few hours while we take up other matters.

Mr. PENROSE. If that was the Senator's understanding I certainly do not wish to be an obstacle in the way of carrying it out in full performance, but I am naturally somewhat depressed by the lack of any accomplishment in this connection to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the chairman of the committee has reason to be very much elated over his accomplishments to-day.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, I do not know. Then we shall have to go ahead with the bill. I have the highest esteem for the Senator from Massachusetts. He has helped the committee in many ways. However, I shall request the Senate to remain here to-night until a late hour and continue to consider the rest of the bill that is undisposed of.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, no one objects to considering other parts of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will state the inquiry.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the request of the Senator from Massachusetts going to extend or postpone consideration of his amendment alone, or any other amendment to this section?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Solely my amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to state that the unanimous-consent agreement is intended to include all amendments except the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so stated in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The unanimous-consent agreement compels action upon every amendment to-day except the one which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts goes over. The Secretary will report the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee proposes, on page 79, line 8, to insert:

CONDITIONAL AND OTHER EXEMPTIONS OF CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 231. That the following organizations shall be exempt from taxation under this title:

(1) Labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations.

(2) Mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 79, lines 24 and 25, where the committee proposes to strike out the words "operated exclusively for the purpose of" and insert the words "substantially all the business of which is confined to," so as to make the paragraph read:

Domestic building and loan associations substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members, and cooperative banks without capital stock organized and operated for mutual purposes and without profit.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the pending amendment, but inasmuch as the committee propose to offer another amendment which will change entirely the effect of the section as amended I think I ought to call the attention of the Senate to the whole matter now.

In order that Senators may understand why my colleague [Mr. POMERENE], and I may seem somewhat insistent upon this matter, I call attention to the fact that probably the State of Ohio has a larger interest in the building and loan association business than any other State in the Union. There are 775 such organizations in Ohio scattered pretty generally throughout the State. I think there is no county in the State that has not a building and loan association. The total number of stockholders in those organizations is 556,000, and the total number of borrowers is 214,000. In that number there are 12,500 farmers; that is to say, there are 12,500 farm loans aggregating some $39,000,000.

As I pointed out a short time ago when this matter came up the existing law provides as follows:

Domestic building and loan associations and cooperative banks without capital stock organized and operated for mutual purposes without profit.

There has been some contest in my State and before the Treasury Department as to the meaning of that language. It has been substantially all clarified and agreed upon, with, perhaps, one important exception, and as my colleague stated recently to the Senate, a case has been made up looking toward the settlement of that matter. In other words, this problem, that involves tremendous property interests and is of the most vital importance to our State, is now well on its way to final solution.

The committee in its wisdom introduced the language which the Secretary has just read, the words "substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members." It was thought at first that that would be objected to. My colleague and I gave considerable time and attention to the matter and communicated with people at home. They were inclined to oppose the amendment, thinking it was very unfair, but we, understanding that that was the final action of the committee, represented the committee's plans to them, and finally secured an agreement upon the proposition upon the part of all the interests that are involved.

Now, the committee comes in at the eleventh hour and proposes another amendment, which, no doubt, it will very soon offer. That is why I am speaking to the matter now. On page 80, line 1, after the word "members," it is proposed to insert the following, "on the basis of their stock holdings." So when the committee amendment shall have been adopted it will read as follows:

Domestic building and loan associations substantially all of the business of which is confined to making loans to members on the basis of their stock holdings.

There are two very serious objections to that. The first is that it will again throw the whole matter into litigation, because I do not think anybody can tell what the phrase "loans to members on the basis of their stock holdings" means. Does it mean if one man owns a dollar share and another one owns a $5 share that loans must be proportionate, or what does it mean? Inasmuch as the question has been thrashed out and inasmuch as the financial situation in Ohio, as elsewhere, is exceedingly delicate, as Senators must know, I suggest that it would be exceedingly unwise at this time to undertake to change a situation which is fraught with the very gravest dangers.

In other words, as I have pointed out, there are 12,000 or more of these loans to farmers, for example, aggregating $39,000,000. What will be the effect if a crisis is precipitated and these loans are called? The building and loan associations with their business have covered the State and have aided in the construction of many homes. As Senators understand, the financial situation now is very tense. When everybody is cutting the corners closely and when the situation confronting every bank and every building and loan association is somewhat dangerous, I suggest that if this system is to be changed, and we here in the Senate are to undertake to arrange a system which is contrary to the building and loan laws of our State, it will lead to very serious results.

If the amendment of the committee now pending should be adopted, there would be no serious objection, but if the second amendment which I have read, amendment numbered 16, shall be adopted, then immediately it will raise the very question which we have sought to avoid. I think I do not overstate the case when I say that if the amendment is written into law, it will drive half the building and loan associations in the State of Ohio into the hands of receivers. I think the present moment is not a good one to undertake that sort of legislation, particularly when, as I have before explained, the matter is now well along in the process of solution.

I do not desire to detain the Senate; I am willing that the amendment as originally proposed by the committee shall be adopted; but I sincerely hope that amendment numbered 16 shall not be adopted, because it will lead to very serious financial results in Ohio. If it shall be adopted, I shall then have to ask the Senate to strike out the whole section. I shall move to strike out the paragraph and insert the existing law just as it now stands.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Simply for information I desire to ask, have the loans of these associations now any relation to the stock interest of the members?

Mr. WILLIS. That is the crux of the whole matter, Mr. President. As my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] explained very clearly the other day—the Senator from Massachusetts, perhaps, was not present for the moment—there are some of the building and loan associations which when they make loans make them by means of the sale of shares of stock, while there are others which loan to outsiders. It will be perfectly apparent to the Senator that this amendment would drive a wedge right through between those two classes of association; and the whole fabric is so delicate and so interlaced that I very much fear that if this amendment shall be adopted it will cause a financial crash. It certainly will not be of benefit to the country.

Mr. LODGE. Is the stock of such associations owned by members held as security for loans?

Mr. WILLIS. That is true as to one particular kind of building and loan association, but there are others that are loaning to outsiders.

Mr. LODGE. Such associations as loan to outsiders, I suppose, accept other security?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; for example, in the case of farm loans they loan upon mortgage securities, and so forth.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I supposed.

Mr. WILLIS. Of course, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows, these concerns carry on their business on a very narrow margin—a margin of about 1 per cent.

To precipitate this question just now I think will be very unfortunate. I do not think in the long run it will bring any revenue to the Government, but I do know that it will lead to very serious financial disaster in the State of Ohio.

In other words, to be frank about it, this is a friendly contest between the banks and the building and loan interests in the State of Ohio as to the meaning, interpretation, and purposes of the building and loan statute. It ought to be settled in Ohio; there is no reason why it should be brought here to be settled. I have said to representatives of banks and to representatives of building and loan associations that Ohio is the place to settle the controversy, and that they should not expect to settle it by a little amendment which is written in here in haste in the Senate. I therefore hope that amendment numbered 16 will be defeated.

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to say that I indorse everything which my colleague has said in respect to the condition existing in Ohio in reference to this matter, but if the Senate will indulge me for just a few moments, I wish to supplement what he has said by a few further observations.

I stated the other day that under our Ohio statute loans can be made by building and loan companies to their members and others. Under the statute they may receive deposits. Some loans—I think comparatively few—are made to those who are not members. If the revised or second amendment proposed by the committee is adopted it is going to subject those building and loan associations that make any loans, no matter how small in number or amount, to those who are not members subject to the payment of this tax. That is the vice of this proposition.

Up to date the building and loan associations have not been compelled to pay any of this tax. Very recently, under the law as it now is, the Treasury Department has held that some of those companies which make loans to other than members are subject to the tax. If that is done it will drive a good many of these associations into receiverships.

Bear in mind, please, that under the Ohio law 5 per cent of the net income or earnings each year must go into a reserve fund. The building and loan associations declare their dividends either annually or semiannually. The dividends of many of the loan associations, at least for six months of the present year, have already been declared and paid—that money has been distributed—and if they are going to be compelled to pay a tax it is going to eat into their reserve fund.

I happen to have received this morning a letter from Mr. Julius Whiting, jr., one of the prominent lawyers in my own county, and a man who has, perhaps, given more attention to the building and loan laws of Ohio and the administration of those laws than any other member of the Ohio bar. I wrote him in regard to this second proposition of the Finance Committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to know how it happens that these building and loan associations, which are organized for the purpose of lending money to their own members, lend it outside as a commercial proposition?

Mr. POMERENE. They have been authorized to do that by our statute; under the statute they can make loans to members or to others. A comparatively small per cent of the loans, however, are made to others than members; but that practice has grown up to some extent. If the Congress is going to adopt the rule that all building and loan associations shall be subject to an income tax, the building and loan associations of Ohio will make their beds accordingly; but the difficulty is that there are two classes of these associations—one that may loan exclusively to its members and another that may loan to members and others. If an association has a thousand loans and only one of those loans is made to a man other than a member, under the provisions of the proposed amendment it would be subject to this tax. That is the shocking thing about it. I have this letter from Mr. Whiting, who, I may say, I think, is known to my colleague.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am asking the Senator is it a correct practice to exempt from taxation a concern which is in the business in a commercial way and is not confining itself to loans to members?

Mr. POMERENE. As a general proposition the Senator may be right; but let that be thrashed out by the Ohio Legislature in the revision of their laws, if they intend to revise them. I think it would be most unfortunate if we were to adopt this amendment and subject building and loan associations to the payment of this tax.

Let me digress for a moment to say that probably 50 or 60 years ago the building and loan associations were not properly inspected, and, as a result, some of the building and loan associations were very unfortunate. So out of the abundance of the experience which we had in those years, the law was revised in Ohio, and we now have the most vigorous inspection, and are not having any trouble in that respect at all. We are so careful about it that if there are any loans that even eat into the reserve account the association has been compelled by the building and loan inspector to make good that reserve account or otherwise be forced into the hands of a receiver and be closed up.

There can be no question about the law being properly administered in the State of Ohio; but, as to some of the building and loan associations, particularly those that have not been in business for a long time, if we are going to make them pay this tax when their earnings have already been distributed, relying upon the law as it is, we are going to force them to the wall.

Now, let me read the letter from Mr. Whiting. It is addressed to me and is dated October 25. He says:

> Your statement of the proposed amendment to building-association provision of the income tax is very startling, and, as you say, would defeat the entire purpose of the provision as originally written into the bill. It is not as if this were a new institution. Upon the faith of former Government provisions for exemption the building associations of Ohio alone have loaned to members and others, as permitted by the Ohio law, more than $500,000,000. The extreme requirement of even mutual companies acting under the cooperative plan has been membership. The statute provides that membership shall be determined by the constitution and by-laws of the separate institutions. Therefore to exempt from taxation only such associations as shall confine their business to making loans to members "on the basis of their stock holdings" would entirely revolutionize the business of these institutions in Ohio. It would require a borrower to take stock to the amount of his entire loan, and would give no opportunity to the association to secure exemptions on the enormous amount of loans already existing.

Mr. Devine—

Who is the secretary of the Building and Loan Association League, I believe it is called—> has probably made a broader and stronger statement than I can do, as he gives his entire attention to this matter.

> In some remarks made in the Senate, Senator PENROSE charged that these companies were returning dividends as high as 32 per cent. The report of the chief inspector of building associations of Ohio, just published, shows the average earnings of the companies to be a little over 6 per cent. In our own company the average is 6.41 per cent on an investment of some $4,000,000. Our dividend to our stockholders is 5 per cent, payable semiannually. Five per cent of the net earnings go to the reserve fund under the State law, and the entire expense of management is less than 1 per cent of the gross earnings. I think this condition prevails in nine-tenths of the associations in Ohio. I do not know where Senator PENROSE got his figures, but they are absolutely erroneous.

Mr. President, that is the situation. I can not feel that there is a disposition here on the part of Congress without any warning to make a change in the law which affects not the future alone but the current year which has passed. I join my colleague in the hope that the latter part of the amendment as it now is before the Senate shall be eliminated and that the amendment as originally proposed by the Finance Committee may be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, that is precisely what I wanted to ask the Senator. The Senator agrees with me that the desired action is that this amendment numbered 16 should not be adopted, but he is satisfied with the amendment originally drawn by the committee as it appears in the bill?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; and I think I may say that that amendment would be entirely satisfactory to the building and loan associations of Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. May the amendment be stated, please?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment again.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is the amendment proposed by the committee, at the foot of page 79:

> Domestic building and loan associations—

The committee amendment proposes to strike out the words, on lines 24 and 25, "operated exclusively for the purpose of," and to insert the words "substantially all the business of which is confined to."

Mr. SMOOT. The committee has no objection to that, nor do I think the Senators from Ohio have any objection to that.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not.

Mr. WILLIS. No; we are agreed to that.

Mr. SMOOT. They are agreed to that amendment, but after that is agreed to the committee desires to offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has been stated by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, the committee desires to offer the following amendment:

On page 80, line 1, after the word "members," insert the following:

> On the basis of their stock holdings.

I shall take just a few moments of the Senate's time to explain the reason of that amendment.

The existing law provides as follows:

> Domestic building and loan associations and cooperative banks without capital stock organized and operated for mutual purposes and without profit.

The House changed that wording by inserting in the House bill the following:

> Domestic building and loan associations operated exclusively for the purpose of making loans to members; and cooperative banks without capital stock organized and operated for mutual purposes and without profit.

The Senators from Ohio thought that that was too drastic upon these associations, and that it did not cover the facts to which both Senators have referred at this time; so the committee agreed to strike out the words "operated exclusively for the purpose of," and to insert "substantially all the business of which is confined to." That was a modification of the House provision so that it would cover associations substantially all of whose business was confined to members. If, however, the amendment that has just been offered by the committee is not agreed to after agreeing to this amendment as reported from the committee first, the result will be that any person can, for instance, secure membership in one of those associations by paying 25 cents for it, and then the association can lend that person under the present provisions of the bill any amount of money, upon any security, and at any rate of interest. All that this amendment means is that the building and loan associations of Ohio shall loan the same as other building and loan associations of the country loan, on the basis of their stock holdings. That is treating all alike.

If the amendment is not adopted, the result will be that in Ohio all of the other institutions doing the same kind of loaning, perhaps to the same class of people, perhaps at exactly the same rate of interest, if they make any profit must make a return to the Government and pay a tax upon it, while these institutions would not pay any tax whatever. All that this amendment means is that if any profits are made they must make a return and pay the same rate of taxation on the gains of the concern that is paid by other corporations doing the same kind of business.

If that is not fair, I do not know what is. I would not for one moment undertake to legislate against an Ohio concern, but remember there are institutions in Ohio perhaps doing business in the same way, upon the same block, in the same city, and shall one be taxed and the other not? That is not fair. All that the amendment means is that we are requiring all the institutions that are doing the same class of business, and perhaps charging, as I said, the same rate of interest, to pay their taxes in the same way. That is the meaning of the amendment that has just been offered in behalf of the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to trespass on the patience of the Senate. I merely want to say this much in answer to the statement of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Here is the one thing that he has not taken into consideration which I am very anxious that the Senate shall take into consideration: Perhaps we ought not to have started in that way; but, as my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] pointed out, many years ago the building and loan law of Ohio was passed. It has been of tremendous benefit to the State. There is not any question about that. I know, in my limited business experience, of literally thousands of homes that have been built and are now occupied by their owners that in all probability could not have been built under the system of financing that obtained before we established the building and loan associations. That law, as my colleague has stated, permits the making of loans to members and also to nonmembers. If now we are to write into this statute a provision which is tantamount to requiring any borrower to become a shareholder, you have practically destroyed the building and loan business, because the average man who buys a lot somewhere and decides that he wants to build a home for himself goes to the building and loan association to get the money. He does not know anything about corporations. He does not know anything about buying shares of stock. He is averse to that sort of thing. He wants to build a home for his family; and if the Senate writes into the law that he has to become a shareholder in a corporation, it is equivalent to saying that he will not do the thing at all and therefore that the companies that have been transacting that sort of business will go out of business.

I hold no brief for them nor for anybody else; but I do say, speaking for the people of Ohio, that the financial situation in our State is not such as to warrant legislation of this character at this time. It will undoubtedly precipitate a crisis and drive a very large number of these perfectly legitimate institutions into the hands of receivers.

I therefore hope the second amendment will be defeated.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. Will the Senator advise me just what prompts this amendment? From whom does it come? What is the purpose of it?

Mr. WILLIS. I am absolutely unable to answer that question. I do not know. I understood that the committee had finally and fully decided upon the matter, and so reported to our people that they had agreed to the first amendment; and now this subsequent amendment is brought in. I know nothing about it, except that it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that when the amendment that has just been agreed to was discussed in the Senate it was not agreed to but went over, and at the very next meeting of the committee this question was brought up for consideration. When the amendment was discussed as it had been suggested, it immediately developed that if the amendment was agreed to without a further amendment it would simply mean that there would be no taxation whatever upon an institution that was lending money to anybody, and, no matter what the profit was, no tax would be paid upon it.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, can the Senator advise the Senate whether the privilege has been abused so far under the operation of the present tax law?

Mr. SMOOT. I know that they have not paid any taxes, and the Senator from Ohio said he knew of one concern that had $39,000,000 loaned. No matter what profits they made they have not paid a dollar of taxes, and I hardly think that is fair. If they do not make any profits, of course, they will not pay any taxes; but whatever profits they do make, it does seem to me that they ought to pay the same tax that any other institution pays which is doing identically the same class of business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Does he dispute the proposition that is propounded by the Senator from Ohio, that this amendment, if adopted, will force a lot of nonshareholding beneficiaries of the building and loan associations to become shareholders?

Mr. SMOOT. To become shareholders?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. The Senator from Ohio said that this language would force them to become shareholders, or else not borrow the money.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not necessary at all. They will have to become shareholders if the company is not to pay any taxes upon its gains on its loans; but if this amendment which has been offered shall be adopted, then, of course, they will be taxable upon those loans, and all they will have to do will be to pay whatever tax is imposed on their gains, not upon the notes they receive, not upon the obligations of the farmer, but on whatever gains there may be to the company they pay a tax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Notwithstanding whether the gains received were from shareholders or nonshareholders.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true. If they loan to nonmembers, then they do the same business as any bank does. Perhaps I should not say any bank, but they do the same business as any bank or any individual who loans upon long-term notes payable so much a month, or so much a quarter, or so much a year. There are many of them which do that, and all of the other concerns of that kind pay a tax, and that is what we are covering by this amendment. Perhaps I had better say that the shareholder does not pay the tax. I think the Senator understood what I meant. Whatever profits are made upon the loans are taxed, that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where profits are made by the corporation?

Mr. SMOOT. By the corporation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, is that limited to the profits made on loans to nonmembers?

Mr. SMOOT. That depends entirely upon the wording. The wording here is "substantially all the business of which is confined to making loans to members."

Mr. BROUSSARD. What is the amendment the Senator is proposing?

Mr. SMOOT. That following the word "profit," on line 3, page 80, there be inserted the words "on the basis of their stock holdings."

Mr. BROUSSARD. What does that mean?

Mr. SMOOT. It means that a man could not buy a membership in the association for 25 cents, and then borrow $10,000 on the strength of that 25-cent membership and escape taxation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me illustrate the effect of this amendment. I have in mind two building and loan associations in one of our smaller cities in Ohio. One of them makes its loans entirely upon stock membership; the other makes loans partly on stock membership and partly to nonmembers. Otherwise the business is done substantially the same. Each of them has assets aggregating between four and five million dollars. They make their loans at the same rates to their borrowers.

As I stated a moment ago, they declare their dividends and distribute their earnings, part of them once a year, I think these two twice a year, semiannually. The earnings for the first half of this year have already been distributed. Under the Ohio law at least 5 per cent of their earnings must be passed to the reserve fund.

If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah is agreed to, one of these companies will be entirely exempt from tax, the other will have to pay its tax upon the earnings from the loans which are made to the shareholders as well as on those made to nonmembers, and whatever that tax is has to come out of the reserve, and it is going to embarrass that second company. I do not think there is such a difference in the business methods of those two companies as to justify the Congress of the United States in saying to the one, "You need not pay a tax," and to the other, "You shall pay it."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the Senator if he can tell us what proportion of the loans of that second company were made to nonmembers?

Mr. POMERENE. I can not give the Senator that information, I regret to say.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator say it is a considerable or noticeable proportion? I am in this frame of mind: If it is a very small fraction, it does not seem important to me; but if it is a growing business, outside of the membership, it is one that ought to attract our attention.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not give the Senator that information with regard to the two companies I had in mind. I do know, however, or at least I have been so advised, and I think my colleague has, too, that there are many of these building and loan associations in which most of the loans are made to members, but sometimes they make other loans to men who are not members.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator be willing that the association should pay a tax upon the profits, if any, made from the loans to nonmembers?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know that I am sufficiently advised to make a statement in reply to that. I would not care to take that responsibility. But my feeling about the matter arises from the fact that these two classes of building and loan associations have been permitted to grow up in Ohio under our law. If they were offending the law, then I would not stand here to plead their cause. In view of the fact that the one class does not technically come under the definition presented by the second amendment, to say to them, "We are going to make you pay this tax notwithstanding the fact that your earnings have already been distributed," seems to me absolutely wrong. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, as I understand it, if there is any purpose in exempting any building and loan association, it is for the purpose of aiding them so that they will assist in home building, those associations that loan at a small rate of interest and that make small incomes. Is there any difference between the beneficence of the institution which makes loans to a man who takes stock and that of one which makes loans to a man who does not?

Mr. POMERENE. Absolutely none at all. I think in the cases I have in mind borrowers are utterly indifferent as to whether they go to the one loan company or to the other loan company. They receive the same service upon the same terms.

Mr. STANLEY. I say to the Senator from Ohio that I am under the impression, though I will not be positive, that the same condition prevails in some other States as in the State of Ohio; that loans are there made to a purchaser of stock or made to a home builder who buys no stock on identically the same terms, and I can not see any reason why the buying of stock in a building and loan association should affect the status of the borrower. The purpose of the law is to foster these institutions.

The building and loan association is about the only institution now that does enable a poor man to build a home, on account of the fact that freight rates and charges of highly organized labor, like that of carpenters, plumbers, and so forth, have kept the cost of building practically where it was in war times. There is more need now for the building of homes than ever before; and the wise purpose of this provision, as I see it, was to enable these institutions to continue to do business. I can see no reason why a difference should be made between the man who goes to the building and loan association and buys stock in order to participate in the earnings of that association, and at the same time to pay for a home in five or ten years, and the man who goes to the association and borrows the money with the expectation of paying it in the same length of time. What does it mean to us from the standpoint of public policy whether he shares in the meager profits of this association or not so long as the association continues to loan on the same terms to the borrower, and for the same purpose, whether he be a stockholder or not?

Mr. SMOOT. There is a great deal of difference. If the Senator's contention is correct, then we ought to allow every bank in the United States to make just such loans as these, and make the profits nontaxable. That is all there is to it.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I would be in favor of exempting banks from paying any revenue upon long-time loans, at a low rate of interest, for the purpose of building homes valued at less than $10,000, let us say.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not this proposition.

Mr. STANLEY. That is practically the business in which building and loan associations are engaged, as everybody knows.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no limit to the amount they can loan. There is no limit as to the value of the home to be built. There is no limit as to the rate of interest which should be charged. There is not a particle of difference between exempting any bank in the United States from paying taxes upon the profits made upon a loan for the building of a home, and the proposition the Senator speaks of.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, one other question. I know the Senator from Utah is thoroughly cognizant of the details of this bill, and I felicitate him on that fact. I do not apprehend the wisdom of exempting building and loan associations, which loan upon the basis of stock ownership, and cutting others out, because the same abuses to which he refers could be perpetrated just as well by buying stock, and if these building and loan associations were loaning large sums at exorbitant rates of interest and on short time, as many of them do, there would be a clamor for their stock, just as there is for bank stock, and it is a matter of common knowledge to those who have any experience with building and loan associations at all that their stocks are held by persons of small income, that their earnings are small, and that their loans are made almost entirely upon modest homes.

Mr. SMOOT. This is quite different from the case where a man subscribes to the stock of a building and loan association and receives money to build a home. In that case every cent that is made over and above the expenses of operating the institution goes to the borrower in proportion to the amount of his loan. Without the amendment I have offered the Ohio bank could lend the Senator money to build a home down in his own State, and the gain would be exempt from taxation.

Mr. STANLEY. They would have to lend to the Senator on the outside, because the Senator would not have money enough to buy stock and borrow money.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows how the stock of building associations is paid for; it is paid for in monthly installments.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. And it virtually works itself out in about 76 months' payments.

Mr. STANLEY. If the Senator will permit me to make another statement, I will be through. If these associations do get a little money on the side, it would be distributed among the vast number of home builders, and I do not believe it would do any particular harm to the Treasury, even if a few large loans were made, because it would go to these shareholders who the Senator admits are home builders and who borrow small amounts on long-time notes.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not a savings bank in the United States that does not make loans similar to this and we tax them upon their profits. Now, if the Senate feels that one kind of bank loaning money to anyone it may desire shall pay a tax on its profits, and another bank perhaps three doors away lending in the same way and at the same rate of interest shall not pay a tax upon its profit, of course the amendment I have offered will be voted down.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. But if they are to be all put upon the same basis I think it is absolutely necessary that the amendment be adopted. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. Are we to understand the Senator from Utah to contend that the business of these building and loan associations is the same as the business of banks and that the building and loan associations are doing a banking business?

Mr. SMOOT. I say that wherever the bank in Ohio makes a loan to a nonmember, that is exactly the same as a savings bank making its loan for the building of a home. I do not say that all the business of the savings bank is that class of business, but whatever part of its business is that kind of business it is exactly the same, and upon the profits on those loans they should be treated exactly alike.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator understands, of course, that a depositor can not carry a checking account in a building and loan association.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I know that.

Mr. WILLIS. It does not do a banking business of that sort, and the Senator further understands, at any rate it is true with reference to associations in Ohio, that they do their business on a margin of about 1 per cent. What can the Senator get on money he deposits in a bank? Perhaps 4 per cent. If he borrows how much does he have to pay for it? I am not complaining about that, but I am trying to show the difference.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if he had gone into the New England savings banks four years ago—I do not know how it is to-day—he would have found that they were loaning for the building of homes at a rate of interest that was so low that they did not make one-half of 1 per cent over and above the rate they were paying for deposits. That is shown in all their statements. All the committee desires is to have fairness in the matter.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may observe, most of the savings societies to which the Senator refers are mutual affairs and they are not taxed under this provision.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. POMERENE. A good many of them are.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; quite a number of them are, I will say to the Senator, but in that case the Senator knows how the loans are made. Whatever profits are made go to a reduction of the loan that is made and not to the concern. The salaries of the officers and the running expenses are paid out of the interest collected and all over and above that goes to the reduction of the loans.

Mr. POMERENE. The earnings go to the depositors instead of to the stockholders.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment. I am opposed to it because I do not wish to hamper in the slightest degree the splendid work being performed by the building and loan associations of the country. We had on January 1 last loans by building and loan associations totaling something like $2,500,000,000. Nearly every dollar of that was loaned on homes, and in nearly every case on homes where the mortgage did not exceed $5,000 or $10,000.

In my State I doubt very much if the provision would affect us, but we have in our State a mutual savings bank system where there are deposits totaling about $5,500,000,000. Those banks have loaned out about 50 per cent of that money on mortgages on improved real estate. The other 50 per cent is loaned upon bonds of different characters, on bank acceptances, and so forth, and the profits in those banks are exempt from taxation because they are mutual savings banks.

Mr. SMOOT. They are exempt under this provision also.

Mr. CALDER. Yes; of course they are. I maintain that as to the building and loan associations, even where the loans are not made to stockholders, we would be doing a very great injustice to the country by attempting to retard the development of this business. These are the only organizations that loan all of their deposits to the business of building homes. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say, in conclusion, that if this section is passed without my amendment I expect to see every bank making real estate loans reorganized and calling themselves domestic building and loan associations. I would not blame them if they did. If they do that they will be free from taxation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the amendment of the committee.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an explanation of community property prepared by a lawyer in my State and also a letter addressed to me on the same subject by another lawyer there and a letter addressed to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] explaining that very difficult matter, which will come up in a day or two in connection with the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. RANSDELL. I also ask that the communications and statement be printed in the ordinary RECORD 8-point type so that Senators can read them. I am having them printed in order that they may be helpful to Senators in considering the matter to which they refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THIGPEN & HEROLD,
Shreveport, La., September 14, 1921.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: I notice in the revenue act as passed by the House a provision to the effect that in the States in which the community property system prevails the entire community income should be rendered and tax paid by the spouse who by the law of the State has the management and control of the community property.

This provision was doubtless inserted at the instance of some expert in the Treasury Department who had conceived the idea that by so doing he could circumvent the effect of the community laws as recognized in the decision of Attorney General Palmer: First, with reference to Texas; and, second, with reference to the States of Washington, Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Louisiana, and Nevada.

In this last opinion, rendered during the present year and approved by Secretary of the Treasury Houston on March 3, 1921 (T. D. 3138), it was recognized that the necessary effect of the community property system in the States named was to vest in the wife, as a partner in community, one-half of all such property, from which the effect followed that all community income belonged equally to husband and wife and should be returned by them accordingly.

The effect of this decision was to remedy what had been an injustice in the administration of the income tax in Louisiana in the past years in the refusal of the administrative officers at Washington to recognize the effect of the provisions of our Civil Code; and the insertion of the provision above referred to in the House bill would seem to be the result of a desire upon the part of some officials in Washington to circumvent the State law if possible.

But if the opinion of the Attorney General, rendered after mature deliberation and based upon a thorough review of the authorities, is a correct exposition of the law of Louisiana, it seems to me absolutely clear that Congress has no power to change the result of the opinion in question. If, as was held by Mr. Palmer, and is clearly the law, the marital community is a partnership, with the corollary that the partners have an equal interest in the profits of the partnership, then Congress can no more force the husband to treat the entire community income as his than it could compel an ordinary commercial partner to return the entire income of the partnership as his own. What is or should constitute taxable income is largely a matter for congressional definition but that it is beyond the power of Congress to compel "A" to pay a tax upon the income of "B" is so clear that it would seem to need no argument.

If Congress can say that the spouse who has the administration of the community property must render the entire community income as his own, when in truth and as a matter of law it is not his own but his and his wife's jointly, then it would have equally the right for the purpose of increasing my surtax to say that if I am the managing partner of a business I must render as mine all of the profits of the partnership.

That the sixteenth amendment had for its purpose and effect merely the exclusion of the source from which a taxed income is derived as a criterion by which to determine its taxability as income, free from the constitutional requirement as to apportionment of direct taxes, was settled in the case of Brushaber v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. (240 U. S., 1 (18)). It is also settled in the Brushaber case that the sixteenth amendment did not change the settled rule that income taxes were "imposts" and "excises," which under the provisions of Article I, section 8, clause 1, of the Constitution, "shall be uniform throughout the United States." Of course, as you know, previous decisions of the Supreme Court had maintained income taxes as "excises," the sixteenth amendment being necessitated by the holding of the Supreme Court in the Income Tax cases (157 U. S., 429), that a tax on incomes derived from certain sources, such as income from real estate, was in substance a direct tax. The sixteenth amendment then merely authorized the taxing of incomes without regard to the source from which the same were derived, but leaving unaffected the provision that such taxes must be uniform throughout the United States.

To tax in Louisiana a husband for his income and also his wife's, while at the same time a man in New York, Massachusetts, or Missouri is taxed only on his own income, is a clear violation of the provision that such tax shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Granting that Congress might validly force a husband to pay taxes upon all income derived either by husband or by wife, such provision must needs be uniform throughout the United States, and it would be plainly usurpation of power upon the part of Congress to say that such provision should be enacted into law applicable only in the States in which the community-property system prevails. For to charge a husband with his wife's one-half of the community income is no whit different than the charge of a husband with his wife's income derived from other sources than her interest in the community.

The matter is so very clear that I can not see how any doubt could exist that the provision in the House bill is beyond the power of Congress; and I should very much appreciate your efforts in preventing this injustice to Louisiana citizens being perpetuated in the act as it passes the Senate, which could only lead to confusion and to long, protracted litigation, finally resulting in the annulling of such provision as unconstitutional.

With regards, respectfully, yours, S. L. HEROLD.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 19, 1921.

Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH,
United States Senate,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The existing law (the revenue act of 1918) imposes a tax "upon the net income of every individual." Having in mind the true situation as to the wife's rights in income in those States that have the community system, an application was made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a regulation which would recognize the fact that in the community States the wife's interest in the earnings is a thing separate and distinct from the husband's, and that would give her the right to make her own return and give the husband the right to include in his return nothing but his own half of such income. The subject was fully discussed and briefed in the department; the commissioner requested an opinion from the Attorney General, and the application was in the end granted. (The opinion of the Attorney General is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 6584–6588.) The effect of this ruling was to reduce the amount of the taxes that the husband and wife together would pay, because, the income of each being reported separately, neither would pay as high surtax rate as would be paid if all of the income was included in one return. The States in which it was recognized by the commissioner that this right exists are Texas, Louisiana, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, and Washington.

Now, it is proposed in the pending revenue to nullify this right of husband and wife in the community States by forcing the husband to include all the income in his return. The language of the bill (subdivision (a), section 213) is that "income received by any marital community shall be included in the gross income of the spouse having the management and control of such community property and shall be taxed as the income of such spouse."

It will be seen that "management and control" is assumed to be equivalent to ownership. This is said, because no supporter of the bill would deny that a wife in a common-law State having separate property has the right to make a separate return of the income from that property, or would assert that in such a State the husband is required to include such income of the wife in his own return. It must be concluded, therefore, that the proponents of the new legislation assumed that the management which the husband in a community State has of the income amounts to ownership.

It seems to me that this proceeds from the lack of a correct understanding of what, in the community States, the rights of the wife in the income are; that is, from a failure to realize that one-half of such income is as much hers as the other half is the husband's, and becomes hers at the same time that the other half becomes his.

On the question of the wife's right I need only call your attention again to a fact well known to you, that her status as to such earnings is in no respect different from that of a member of a commercial partnership with respect to the earnings of such partnership, in which the managerial duties and powers are conferred by the partnership agreement upon some other member of the firm, and to the fact that upon dissolution of the marital relation by divorce or death she has an absolute right to one-half, also to the fact that if the husband so exercises his power of management and control as to commit fraud on the wife's rights, she can restrain him in a court of equity.

These principles which are peculiar to the laws of the States, from one of which you come, are not so well known or understood by others from the common-law States, and being so unlike anything found by them in their own States are not at once given the effect that should be accorded them.

To repeat, I am quite sure none of these gentlemen would give their approval to a bill which would require earnings which were income of the wife and not of the husband to be included in the latter's return, thereby increasing the amount of tax paid over the aggregate amount that would be paid by the husband and wife on separate returns. Yet this is what the pending bill proposes to do in the community States.

In the discussions in the department, previously referred to, it was pointed out that the wife in the community States is required to pay no estate tax on the half of the community property which she comes into possession of upon the death of the husband because it is already hers, and she does not take through the husband. This was of controlling importance in satisfying them, and the Attorney General afterwards, that during the life of the spouses the wife's interest in the earnings is not derivative through the husband, but vests in her the moment such earnings are made.

The practice up to this time, without exception, has been for each person in whom income vests to make a return. This finds exemplification in partners, beneficiaries under trusts, etc. Each partner makes a return of his distributive interests only in the partnership earnings; and each beneficiary of his interest only in the income of the trust estate. No reason exists why the same should not continue to be true, or why the wife in whom one-half of the income vests should not be permitted to make a separate return. Or, putting it the other way, no reason exists why the husband should be required to include in his return the half of the income which does not vest in him.

If it be said that this is a discrimination in favor of citizens of the community States, and will result in the payment by husband and wife there of a less amount of tax on the same amount of income than would be paid in a common-law State, the answer is—

First. That you are applying no different rule to husband and wife than is applied in the common-law States, namely, taxing each on his or her income only; and Second. That the securing of uniformity does not require that you should tax any individual in any State on income which is not in fact his.

It will be observed that I have made no reference to the constitutional limitation on the power of Congress to tax an individual on his income only. My opinion is that the proposed legislation is beyond the power of Congress.

Very truly, yours,

JESSE ANDREWS.

COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Memorandum of legal and equitable objections to the following provision in pending tax bill H. R. 8245:

"Income received by any marital community shall be included in the gross income of the spouse having the management and control of such community property and shall be taxed as the income of such spouse."

The existing law and present regulations of the Treasury Department is stated in the opinions of the Attorney General set forth in Treasury Decisions 3071 and 3138 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 6584–6588, Saturday, October 1, 1921) issued September 18, 1920, and March 3, 1921, respectively. These opinions of the Attorney General are based on an exhaustive examination of the law and court decisions of the community property States, viz, Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, New Mexico. Nevada, Texas, and Washington.

The opinions announce that in all but California the interest of the spouses is equal and vested; that is to say, both husband and wife each own one-half of the community property and any income derived therefrom.

The purpose of the community provision in the pending bill, above quoted, is to nullify the laws of the States in question, and force the husband and wife to include in their individual tax returns income which under the law of their States does not belong to them. The proposed legislation is inequitable and violative of the Constitution of the United States.

The most important effect of the law of the community States is to create a partnership between the husband and wife, and as a result, one-half of the income and property acquired by this partnership immediately vests in the wife. This one-half share of the property does not go to the wife indirectly through her husband, but under the community law one-half vests in and becomes her property at the same time it is acquired, and at the moment when the other one-half vests in the husband.

The sixteenth amendment to the Constitution permits Congress to tax a person's income. The Federal Government under this amendment has always taxed the real or equitable owner of income, and has never attempted to tax one person on the income of another person.

The community system of law as it exists in Louisiana and other States is more analogous as a matter of legal principle and substantial fact to a partnership than any other common-law legal status. The right of the husband to administer and control the community property that is acquired as a result of the joint or individual efforts of the two spouses is also in substance analogous to the relation of a trustee with power of administration at common law.

Under the community or partnership theory the husband and wife become absolute and equal owners of all property and income acquired during the marriage share and share alike. In a number of the community States the wife must join with the husband in the disposition of the community property. The courts of the various States have repeatedly held that there is no distinction to be made between husband and wife as to the degree, quantity, nature, or extent of the interest each has in the community property.

The husband as a rule is given by law the administration of this property during the marriage which is in the nature of the right of a managing partner at common law or a trustee with very full power of administration. The husband, as managing partner or trustee or, as he is called in some of the community States, the master of the community, is given the administration of the community property by law, and this right to administer is terminated by divorce or his death or the death of his wife. The right of control may also be terminated by a separation of the community property, which may be claimed and obtained by the wife on the ground that the husband is a reckless administrator or gambler or otherwise incapable of administering the community property. Moreover, like a trustee or managing partner at common law, the husband can not give away the immovable community property and deprive his wife of her one-half interest in the property and income; nor can he deal with it in any way in fraud of his wife's property rights. In case there is a dissolution of the community partnership while the wife is living, she takes her share by virtue of the property having belonged to her from the date it was acquired by the partnership. And on the death of either spouse the respective share is the estate of the deceased, devolving in accordance with the law of descent, and therefore taxed for inheritance-tax purposes by both the State and Federal Governments.

In case a dissolution of the partnership or community is provoked by a divorce it is important to note the fact that if the wife commits adultery or is otherwise at fault it is immaterial in so far as her right to insist on a division of the property is concerned; and she can under any circumstances, because she is the actual vested owner of the one-half of the property acquired during marriage, insist upon its delivery to her when the divorce decree is rendered.

Another very important illustration of the wife's right and a corresponding burden and limitation placed upon the husband in Louisiana is the fact that even without divorce proceedings or death the wife may demand one-half of the community property during the marriage on the ground that the husband either gambles or is a reckless administrator, and therefore incapable of properly administering the joint property.

We emphasize these fundamental and practical features of the Louisiana or community law in order to show clearly that the community or partnership between husband and wife in Louisiana and other community States is not a fiction, but is in substance a partnership imposed by law which creates burdens and limitations as well as privileges in relation to the property rights of husbands and wives. These burdens and property-right limitations are unknown in the common-law States; and we submit that any benefits that may flow from the community relationship are more than counterbalanced by equally as many legal burdens and restrictions placed upon the property rights of the husband and wife. In short, the only common-law analogies, as we have said before, that illustrate the practical and legal effect of the community system in Louisiana and other States are to be found in the law of partnerships and trusts.

It follows from the brief outline of the principles and analogies we have stated that to take away from community States the right of the husband and wife to divide the community property for taxation purposes would in fact be a discrimination against such States and would not produce uniformity; but, on the other hand, take away a right obtained from an ancient system of laws without giving the husbands and wives the corresponding property rights and privileges in relation to property that common-law spouses enjoy. It would in law and fact force the husbands in seven States of the Union to pay a tax on some one else's property and income, which is unjust, discriminatory, and unconstitutional.

The amendment which is proposed is plainly designed to force the husband and wife in Louisiana and other community States, who under their local State laws are partners in fact, with the husband as trustee or managing partner, and who are in law and fact subject to substantial limitations as to their joint property rights, to report the community property in the name of the husband only, when, as a matter of law and fact, the husband only owns and acquires one-half of the property and income and is practically trustee for his wife of the other one-half. To force the husband to pay an income tax on partnership or community property in order supposedly to produce uniformity means that Congress is attempting to ignore the fundamental law of Louisiana and six other States of the Union and intends to treat what is in Louisiana in substance a partnership created by law different from voluntary partnerships in every common-law State. The only reason or distinction apparent for such discrimination is that the community partnership in community States is created by law and happens to relate to a husband and wife, whereas in other States partnerships may be created voluntarily between all persons. Surely no such technical difference justifies Congress in attempting to emasculate the fundamental law of Louisiana.

Furthermore, in addition to the discrimination resulting from voluntary partnerships, it is important to note that as a matter of fact there are a number of common-law States that permit the husband and wife to form a partnership voluntarily, and in these States the husband and wife may execute a partnership agreement embodying the identical principles of the Louisiana law and may thus enjoy all the benefits of separate returns for taxation purposes. Furthermore, such a voluntary partnership will not be affected by the proposed amendment, which only applies to so-called "community property" and which is therefore intended to and actually does affect only seven States. The adoption of the proposed amendment therefore would result in permitting voluntary partnerships in other States to divide income, and would in seven States of the Union, where such a partnership is created by law and called a community partnership, prevent the division of income and the making of separate returns.

It is submitted that if the proposed amendment is passed Louisiana and community State husbands will be forced to pay on partnership incomes, whereas in the common-law States where a voluntary partnership can be contracted the husband and wife can by agreement obtain the benefits of dividing their incomes. In short, the result of the passage of the proposed amendment will discriminate against Louisiana and other community States by preventing a legal result flowing from the laws of the community States that can be obtained in the other States of the Union by voluntary contract. It is clear, therefore, that instead of producing uniformity the law will be a prolific source of diversity and discrimination for income-tax purposes.

In common-law States if A and B form a partnership and agree that the profits shall not be distributed for a definite time or on certain contingencies, it has never been suggested that there is anything inequitable in permitting A and B to make their returns for income-tax purposes on the basis of one-half of the income of the partnership in the name of each partner. It has never been suggested that A or B must pay an individual income tax for surtax purposes based not only on individual income but also on the income of a partner.

In Louisiana and other community States the husband and wife are partners in respect to certain property acquired during the marriage, and to compel the husband to report the share of the wife in the partnership of community income as his own is taxing him on the income of another person, which is not only inequitable and unjust but unconstitutional.

On the other hand, if the husband in community States is analogized to a trustee at common law in so far as he administers one-half of the community property or income for his wife, surely it can not be contended that one in the position of a trustee for another person can or should be forced to add the income derived from property for the benefit of the beneficiary to his individual property and income for Federal income-tax purposes. Yet this is in substance what the amendment proposes to do, by forcing a Louisiana and community husband to add the community income to his personal income for taxation purposes.

It is respectfully submitted that if common-law States desire to subject a husband to the partnership limitations and burdens we have outlined in relation to property acquired during marriage and thus establish the partnership principles of law that permit division of income for Federal taxation purposes, there is nothing to prevent other States in the Union from accepting this advanced view of woman's rights by adopting the community system. By establishing a community system, which has prevailed in seven States long before the income-tax amendment was adopted, common-law States may obtain the uniformity contended for, and the same advantages that flow from the law and facts in community States. On the other hand, to ignore by Federal legislation the law of seven States of the Union for income-tax purposes, and to attempt to nullify its effect is not only unconstitutional, but is a discrimination against the community States involved. You can not, by law, forcibly place a husband and wife in the seven community States on the same basis as a husband and wife in common-law States, because in Louisiana they are in fact partners, and in the common-law States they are not partners and the wife has no interest whatever in the property acquired subsequent to marriage. If uniformity based on fundamental law and principles is sought, then a husband and wife in Louisiana and the community States should be treated like partners engaged in a partnership enterprise in common-law States.

A few concrete cases by way of illustration will show very clearly that the common-law husband is not subject to the limitations placed on a Louisiana husband in relation to marital property; and that in all probability a New York or common-law husband would not, if offered a choice, give up his common-law rights and accept the community-law limitations, simply in order to secure the slight benefit for income-tax purposes which result legally and naturally from the Louisiana and other community laws.

(1) Suppose a husband in Louisiana has $1,000,000 of 6 per cent bonds at the date of his marriage and earns $1,000,000 in addition the first year of his marriage. At the end of 12 months his estate is worth $2,000,000. The $1,000,000 owned before marriage remains, in so far as the principal amount is concerned, the separate property of the husband. Under the law the $60,000 interest on the separate property becomes partnership or community property and the $1,000,000 earned subsequent to marriage also becomes partnership or community property, each spouse owning one-half the property and income. Suppose at the end of the year the wife commits adultery or deserts her Louisiana husband and her husband obtains a divorce, under the law of Louisiana the wife, even though criminally at fault in the divorce proceedings, simply because of the fact that she actually owned one-half of the partnership property, can immediately demand an accounting and force the husband to deliver one-half of the $1,060,000, or $530,000, to her. In New York and the other common-law States, however, the wife would have no claim to the property thus acquired, because New York does not recognize the wife as a partner and joint owner, but considers the husband the absolute owner. Furthermore, the wife in a common-law State, under such circumstances, could not even claim alimony.

(2) Take a second practical case: Suppose the same Louisiana man with $1,000,000 worth of 6 per cent bonds marries in Louisiana and accumulates property as described in the first illustration. Immediately after the marriage his wife can will one-half of the property that may be acquired as a result of the marriage partnership to her twenty-second cousin or to a stranger, and, at the end of a year, if the wife dies, $530,000 will go to the wife's legatee, even though the husband may have 15 children by a previous marriage. Because of the wife's absolute property and partnership right to one-half of the income and property the husband can not in any way prevent such a result. It is to be noted particularly that the wife's legatees can even claim one-half of the income from the $1,000,000 worth of bonds that the husband had at the time of the marriage, even though children of the husband by a previous marriage exist. On the other hand, a New York wife or a wife in common-law States has no such right, and the husband's property is subject only to his disposition by will or the law of inheritance of the State; and the wife has no right to make a will affecting the property of a husband in any way.

(3) It is to be noted also that in Louisiana and community States the husband, like a common-law trustee or managing partner, can not give away the community or partnership property in fraud of the wife's interest. In common-law States the husband is not subject to any such limitation in relation to the disposition of property acquired during the marriage for the very good reason that in common-law States the wife has no interest in the property and therefore no control over its disposition.

(4) In Louisiana and some community States if a husband becomes a gambler and a reckless and dangerous trustee of the community property acquired during marriage, as we have already explained, the wife can demand a division and settlement of the community property and take one-half of the property and income away from the control and administration of the husband. A husband at common law, since he owns the entire property and income that may be acquired during marriage, can not be interfered with and can dispose of his property by gambling or in as reckless and extravagant manner as he chooses, and the wife, of course, has no right to complain.

(5) Another important difference between the law of Louisiana and the common-law States is illustrated and recognized in the application of the Federal estate tax law. Since the husband and wife are partners and each owns one-half of the property and income acquired during marriage, it follows that when the husband dies the wife does not inherit one-half of the community property, because it already belongs to her. The wife simply takes charge of the administration of her one-half of the property and does not pay an inheritance tax. The legatees and heirs of the husband take by inheritance the husband's one-half of the property, and, of course, pay a tax. Likewise, when the wife dies the husband does not pay an inheritance tax on one-half of the property, but the heirs or legatees of the wife pay an inheritance tax on the one-half of the partnership property belonging to the wife, and the husband is forced to make an immediate partition and division of his property and deliver one-half to the heirs or legatees of the wife. In common-law States the property, being the property of the husband, is treated as one estate for inheritance purposes. It is to be noted in this connection that the proposed amendment only applies to the community States, in so far as reporting income is concerned, and leaves the law as it is in relation to the inheritance tax. If the amendment is adopted, the Federal Government will ignore and disregard the joint ownership of the wife for income-tax purposes and recognize it for inheritance-tax purposes. Surely Congress can not create an obvious legal inconsistency.

It must be remembered, and it can not be too strongly emphasized, that the community system imposes serious property limitations on the husband in the nature of a marital partnership, and the burdens and limitations that result may well be considered sufficient to counterbalance the taxation benefits that now exist and certainly justify the recognition of the community system by the Federal Government in its scheme of taxation, not only from the standpoint of equity but as a matter of constitutional right.

Another very important discrimination that will result from the adoption of this amendment should be seriously considered. Community States recognize three kinds of property—separate property of a husband, the separate property of the wife, and the community or partnership property acquired jointly during marriage. In Louisiana and some community States the income from the separate property of the wife becomes community property when it accrues during the marriage. In common-law States the income from the separate property of the wife remains the property of the wife. The proposed amendment if adopted would mean not only that the husband must report for income-tax purposes his individual separate income and that he must add to this one-half of the community income that belongs to the wife, but further that he must add the income that is derived from the separate property of the wife—that is, income from property owned by the wife before her marriage. This results from the fact that under the law of Louisiana income from the separate property of the wife administered by the husband becomes community property. If the amendment is adopted, the husband in Louisiana will be forced to pay an individual income tax based on the income of the separate property of the wife, whereas in common-law States where a community does not exist the income from the separate property of the wife may be separately reported. By virtue of the community system the Federal Government will be recognizing the property rights established by community States for purposes of adding the separate property of the wife to his income, when no such rule prevails at common law and a wife may make a separate return. The result will be a plain and appalling discrimination resulting in a community husband paying an income tax on the separate income of the wife and a common-law husband reporting such income in the name of the wife. This inequity and discrimination can only be corrected by forcing husbands in common-law States to report not only their own income, but the income from the separate property of the wife for individual income-tax purposes.

With reference to the argument as to the necessity for bringing about harmony in the Federal taxation law, this is impossible on account of the fact that the Federal tax must be based on the person's income, and what is property and income of an individual, corporation, or partnership is necessarily a matter depending on the constitutions and laws of the various States of the Union. In common-law States a husband may make a gift of half of his property to his wife and thereafter the income from the property thus donated may be returned as the separate property of the wife. This is done as a matter of practice, and has never been questioned. The law of Louisiana and other community States makes the wife owner of one-half of the income and property acquired during marriage, and yet the Federal Government by the proposed amendment is attempting to ignore this fundamental law of the State for taxation purposes. The result will be, in case the amendment is adopted, that simply because the property becomes joint property as a result of the positive law of Louisiana and other community-property States, a different rule will be applied in community States than is applied in other States where the same situation is brought about voluntarily.

We might give numerous illustrations showing that by legal manipulation the ownership of property may be and is frequently changed in the various common-law States, resulting in a different application of the Federal income tax law. This condition of affairs is inherent and fundamental under our State and Federal Constitution, and vested property rights as fixed by the various State laws must in the nature of things be recognized and followed by the Federal Government in applying its laws. It is submitted that the principles we have outlined are elementary under our constitutional system.

Finally, we desire to point out, by way of example, a set of facts and the legal result, which very clearly illustrate the discrimination and injustice that will result from the adoption of the proposed amendment. If a husband and wife domiciled in Louisiana accumulate $1,000,000, this is community property, and under the amendment disregarding the Louisiana law for Federal tax purposes, the husband is compelled to report as his income the wife's one-half of the community income. If the husband and wife, however, sell their Louisiana property and move to New York or some other common-law State and invest the proceeds of the property in the latter State, the common-law States, under the law and decisions of the courts, recognize the vested interest of the wife created by the law of Louisiana, where the property was acquired, and the $1,000,000 invested in New York is therefore recognized by the courts of New York as belonging one-half to the husband and one-half to the wife.

This is true, even though the property technically may stand in the name of the husband in the common-law State, for under such circumstances the husband is considered trustee for $500,000 of the property for the benefit of the wife. In New York, therefore, or in any common-law State, when the property taken from the community State is reinvested, one half immediately becomes the property of the husband and the other half the separate property of the wife, and the husband and wife may make separate returns for Federal income tax purposes.

It is clear in the light of these facts that the result of the situation is that a husband and wife who sell their community property in Louisiana and reinvest it in common-law States where the same property will be considered separate property will be able to make separate returns in the common-law States, whereas if they had remained in Louisiana they could not, under the proposed amendment, make separate returns. The amendment in attempting to emasculate the law of Louisiana and applying as it does only to community property States would result in a discrimination against community States and would not be legally applicable when the husband and wife removed their property to another State, because, as we have pointed out, the law of other States would recognize legal facts and property rights which Congress proposes to ignore, and the Federal income tax law would also recognize the law of the new domicile and follow it in this connection by allowing the spouses to make separate returns.

We have the amusing and illogical situation of Congress attempting to fix property rights in seven States for taxation purposes in the very teeth of the law of the seven States involved, when, if the same property is removed to the other States of the Union, these latter States recognize the law of Louisiana and the property rights of the spouses, and Congress, following the law of the common-law States, taxes the former community husband and wife on the very basis that they should have been taxed on if the amendment had not been adopted. In short, Congress will recognize for income-tax purposes the law of common-law States which recognize the law of Louisiana, but when dealing directly with Louisiana citizens the Louisiana property law will be disregarded.

The facts and laws we have just stated make clear how futile and impossible it is for Congress to ignore property rights in an attempt to produce uniformity, and that instead of securing uniformity the proposed amendment, even if it could be adopted under the Constitution, will produce endless confusion and inequities.

Respectfully submitted.

"II. The articles of the Louisiana Revised Civil Code creating and regulating the partnership or community of property existing between spouses are Revised Civil Code articles 2399, 2328, 2329, 2332, 2334, 2402, 2403, 2404, 2405, 2406, 2408, 2386, 915, 916. "III. Contracts of partnership may be made voluntarily by husbands and wives in many of the States of the Union. See Ruling Case Law, volume 13, page 1368. According to Hubbel's Legal Directory, 1921, containing a statement of the law of each State by leading law firms, contracts between husband and wife are specifically authorized in the following States: Alabama, Code 1907, section 4497; California, Civil Code, 1920, section 158; Delaware, 1919, chapter 197, page 524. The statute reads as follows: "* * * she may contract jointly (including with her husband, or separately, sue and be sued," etc.; Minnesota, General Statutes, 1913, section 7147, except contracts relating to real estate of either party; Mississippi, Hemingway's Code, 1917, section 2055, except contracts giving rise to claims of compensation for work done; New York, Consolidated Laws (second edition), 1917, page 1877, section 51, except contracts to relieve husband from liability for support of wife or to alter the marriage; North Carolina, Consolidated Statutes, 1919, sections 2507, 2515, with certain restrictions on contracts affecting real property of the wife; North Dakota, Compiled Laws, 1913, section 4411; Ohio, General Code, 1921, section 7999; Oklahoma, Revised Laws, 1910, section 3353; South Dakota, Revised Code, 1919, section 171.

(See 244 U. S., 603, page 592, and cases cited in opinion of Attorney General, T. D. 3138.)

"V. When community property acquired by a husband and wife domiciled in a community State is sold and the spouses remove to a common-law State and reinvest the property, the courts of the common-law State will recognize the joint property interest of the wife in the property thus brought into the latter State, on the theory that the wife's ownership of the property was fixed and vested by the law of the community State prior to the removal of the property from such State. Mr. GERRY. For the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] I submit two amendments, and ask that they be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to refer back to page 80, line 4, of clause 5, down to and including line 8, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that that would not be in order now under the unanimous-consent agreement. That will be reached after we get through with the committee amendments. It can be taken up at a later time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose there will be no parliamentary difficulty about offering it at the proper time?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is satisfactory. I do not care whether it is offered now or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi withdraws his request. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 87, beginning with line 5, the committee proposes to insert:

(7) A reasonable allowance for the exhaustion, wear and tear of property used in the trade or business, including a reasonable allowance for obsolescence. In the case of such property acquired before March 1, 1913, this deduction shall be computed upon the basis of its fair market price or value as of March 1, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my attention has just been called to the fact that the amendment just agreed to was one in which the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was interested and which he had asked to have go over when it was reached if he were not present. I did not have a memorandum of it. He is absent at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator refer to the amendment that has just been agreed to?

Mr. REED. Yes. I ask that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered and that the amendment be allowed to stand until the junior Senator from Utah can be present.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from Missouri to allow it to stand as agreed to, and if the junior Senator from Utah wishes to take it up afterwards we will ask for a reconsideration of it at that time? I doubt very much whether my colleague will wish to do that.

Mr. REED. With the understanding that on the request of the junior Senator from Utah there will be a reconsideration and he will be given full opportunity to present it, I will allow the matter to stand.

Mr. SMOOT. I will agree to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 95, beginning with line 21, the committee proposes to insert section 237, under the subhead "Payment of corporation income tax at source."

Mr. SMOOT. That must go over until we decide the question as to the rate of tax to be imposed on the incomes of corporations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 103, in lines 2 and 3——

Mr. SMOOT. The question of capital stock tax must be decided before we can pass upon this amendment; therefore I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will go over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 125, under the subheading "Returns to be public records," where the committee propose to insert——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask that that may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it will go over.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to inquire how long it is expected to keep us here this evening? We have been getting along very well.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I wish he would just let us run through the bill. There are not very many more amendments to be considered. Just as soon as we get through the bill we will take a recess.

Mr. REED. We have reached our dinner time. It is now after 6 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. It will not take very long. There may be a few other amendments to which there is no opposition that we can act upon to-night.

Mr. REED. Very well; I will wait a little while.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, there are yet pending 16 committee amendments, 64 amendments proposed by Senators on the majority side, and 62 amendments which have been proposed by individual Senators on the minority side. Of the committee amendments, but 3 can be acted on to-night, because they are tied up with other amendments which have gone over for sufficient reasons. I think that if those committee amendments which the experts have stated could be taken up to-night could be considered and disposed of, then we might take a recess.

Mr. REED. And they may not occasion debate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; they may not occasion debate.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. REED. To what three amendments does the Senator from Indiana refer?

Mr. SMOOT. There is an amendment to be offered on page 127, line 12.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 126, beginning in line 12, with the heading "Publication of statistics."

Mr. SMOOT. That amendment has gone over.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That amendment was passed over at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. SMOOT. On page 127, line 12, I move to amend the title by striking out before the word "possessions" the words "United States," and after the word "possessions" inserting the words "of the United States."

Mr. REED. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to change the subhead on page 127, line 12, so as to read:

Citizens of possessions of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment is agreed to. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 128, beginning in line 16, where the committee propose to insert the subhead "Retroactive exemption of income from sources within the possessions of the United States," and section 262 (a)——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that Dr. Adams has prepared an amendment to this title, and therefore I will have to ask that it go over for to-night.

Mr. KELLOGG. May I ask the Senator from Utah to what it relates?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a Philippine matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over without objection. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 146, being "Title IV.—Estate tax."

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask if the amendment on page 129, beginning in line 21, under the subhead "Effective date of title," has been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that it has not been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have that amendment agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 129, line 21, the committee proposes to insert the subhead, "Effective date of title."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 129, line 22, to strike out "256. This," and to insert "253. That this," and in lines 23, 24, and 25, to strike out "1921, except sections 206, 207, 224, 237, 241, 242, 245, 250, and 903, and subdivision (b) of section 202, all of which shall take effect January 1, 1922," and to insert the numerals "1921."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish the Secretary would announce at whose request the amendments have been passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was passed over at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin asked that the amendment go over; but it is agreeable to him that it be acted upon now.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if the effect of this language in any way is to exempt from taxes any individuals who would otherwise be taxed?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not. No individuals whatever would under this language escape taxation.

Mr. REED. That was my understanding of the matter, but I have not time at this moment to examine carefully the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator from Missouri of that.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The next amendment passed over is on page 146.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 146, "Title IV—Estate Tax."

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 176, to strike out from line 4 down to and including line 25, relative to taxes on soft drinks, and so forth, which was passed over at the request of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. We can not dispose of that amendment to-night.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think we can.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. It will be necessary to have a vote on it, and we should, therefore, have to call for a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. We can secure a quorum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is there to be opposition to an amendment to tax the articles covered by the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator an amendment to offer to this particular item?

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understood, an amendment had been rather agreed upon by those Senators who had been paying attention to this new situation. I do not insist upon it, of course, and I shall not demand the presence of a quorum.

Mr. LODGE. What does the Senator from New York desire to do? Does he desire to offer a substitute for the language which is proposed to be stricken out?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to offer a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Why not do that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from New York says that an amendment has been agreed upon——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I say an amendment has been agreed to informally. Both my colleague and I were requested by members of the Finance Committee yesterday evening to get together and discuss the best method to be employed and the most appropriate language to use in placing a tax upon alcoholic beverages withdrawn from bond and sold for medicinal purposes. We have done so, and we are ready.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator from New York confer with members of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The members of the Committee on Finance requested us to prepare the amendment. We have done so, and we are now ready to go on.

Mr. WILLIS. I suggest that if we are going into that question to-night we will have to have a quorum. It is a matter of great importance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator even read the amendment?

Mr. WILLIS. No; that is one reason why we shall have to have time to consider it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like to offer the amendment.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no objection to the Senator offering the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not offer it if it is going to be put over before I do so.

Mr. WILLIS. There is no desire to prevent the Senator offering his amendment; but I say that if we are going into this question to-night we shall have to have a quorum here.

Mr. LODGE. We can get a quorum. The Senator need not worry about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let the Senator from New York offer his amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just a word of explanation. On yesterday I offered an amendment which has been printed. At about the same time my colleague [Mr. CALDER] offered an amendment. My amendment imposes a tax upon malt liquors which may be withdrawn and sold for medicinal purposes in accordance with existing law and the regulations of the Treasury. It also imposes a tax upon vinous liquors which may be withdrawn and used for medicinal purposes in accordance with the law and the regulations of the Treasury. It also imposes a tax upon spirituous liquors withdrawn and used in the same way. My colleague's amendment applies only to spirituous liquors and not to malt liquors or vinous liquors. I think the provisions of his amendment in regard to spirituous liquors are better than mine, and I therefore offer the amendment which I presented yesterday, so far as it relates to malt liquors and vinous liquors, and have made it conform to the amendment of my colleague as it affects spirituous liquors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will state the amendment to the committee amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 176, in line 2, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the words "soft drinks," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "beverages"; and on page 176, after line 25, insert the following:

SEC. 600. That there shall be levied upon intoxicating malt liquors containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, manufactured as provided by the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act, brewed or manufactured, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, a tax of 60 cents per wine gallon.

SEC. 601. That upon all vinous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act, which are hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, when sold or removed for consumption, a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon.

SEC. 602. (a) That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all distilled spirits, except alcohol and except such distilled spirits as are subject to the tax imposed by subdivision (e), now in bond or that have been or that may be hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, in lieu of the internal-revenue taxes now imposed thereon by law, a tax of $6.40 on each proof gallon, to be paid the distiller or importer when withdrawn and collected under the provisions of existing law.

(b) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on alcohol, except such as may be withdrawn free of tax for denaturation or other lawful tax-free purpose, or such as is subject to the tax imposed by subdivision (c), withdrawn for use in the manufacture of the articles enumerated in paragraphs (b), (c), (d), (e), and (f) of section 4 of Title II of the national prohibition act, or other lawful nonbeverage purpose, in lieu of the internal-revenue taxes now imposed thereon by law a tax of $2.20 per proof gallon. Such tax on domestic alcohol shall be paid on withdrawal by the producer thereof or by the proprietor of the industrial alcohol bonded warehouse from which withdrawn, and on imported alcohol shall be paid by the importer thereof.

(c) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on alcohol withdrawn for use in the manufacture for sale of rectified liquor, in lieu of the internal-revenue taxes now imposed thereon by law a tax of $6.40 per proof gallon. As used in this section the term rectified liquor means any mixture produced in such manner that the person rectifying, purifying, refining, or mixing liquors is a rectifier within the meaning of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes as amended; but rectification under such section shall not be construed to include the process of extraction of water from high-proof spirits for the production of absolute alcohol, or of extraction of charcoal from spirits by filtration.

(d) On all alcohol on which tax has been or shall hereafter be paid at the $2.20 rate, provided in subdivision (b) and which is diverted to an unlawful purpose in violation of the internal-revenue laws or the national prohibition act, or to use in the manufacture of rectified liquor, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid an additional tax of $4.20 per proof gallon, to be paid by the person responsible for such diversion: Provided, That on alcohol withdrawn tax-free and so diverted, tax shall be similarly assessed and collected at the rate of $6.40 per proof gallon.

(e) Upon all distilled spirits other than alcohol, produced in or imported into the United States which, on the effective date of this act are held out of bond by any person for sale, or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor tax of $6.40 per proof gallon, less the amount of any internal-revenue taxes previously paid thereon: Provided, That upon alcohol held by a person who is a rectifier within the meaning of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, for use in the manufacture for sale of rectified liquor, a similar floor tax shall be assessed and collected.

(f) The internal-revenue taxes imposed by subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) upon distilled spirits and alcohol imported into the United States shall be in addition to import duties now or hereafter imposed thereon by law.

(g) The provisions of section 35, Title II, of the national prohibition act, imposing double tax liability shall be applicable to the taxes herein provided.

(h) Nothing in this title shall be construed as in any manner limiting or restricting the provisions of Title III of the national prohibition act.

(i) That liens on distillery premises created under section 3251 of the Revised Statutes as amended, and consents under section 3262 of the Revised Statutes as amended, are hereby discharged and canceled where distillery operations have been permanently discontinued and there is no outstanding liability of the distiller for taxes or penalties and no litigation is pending between the distiller and the United States or any officer thereof: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall affect in any manner forfeitures heretofore effected under such sections and consents, or proceedings in forfeiture now pending. Where operations are permanently discontinued at any distillery with spirits in any bonded warehouse and there are no outstanding accrued taxes or penalties, an indemnity bond satisfactory to the commissioner may be given in lieu of the lien and consents under such sections, such bond to be in a penal sum equal to the value of the property covered by the lien.

(j) Where a tax is imposed in this section upon a proof gallon, a like tax shall be imposed upon each wine gallon when below proof, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof or wine gallon.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say just a word in explanation, not to explain the amendment so much as to——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this amendment in order at this time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps I can throw a little light on that. I was about to endeavor to do so, although the inquiry is addressed to the Chair, and I do not want to take words out of his mouth.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a very peculiar situation here, to which I should like to have a chance to allude.

On page 176 the Committee on Finance offers an amendment, which is printed in this bill. It consists in striking out sections 601 and 602. At no other place in the printed copy of the bill before us is there anything to be substituted for that. Later on we were informed that the majority Members, or some mysterious aggregation of persons in the Senate, had agreed upon something to take its place, and that is printed in this pamphlet which we had before us so long—upon what page I can not quite remember. It is amendment No. 42; and as soon as Senators began reading amendment No. 42 it promptly lost all its adherents. And now we are informed that no one is going to have the hardihood to offer it as the committee amendment. Therefore I have offered an amendment to the committee amendment as set forth in the bill. It is certainly, in my judgment, in order at this time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course the committee amendments have precedence, but this is an amendment to a committee amendment. I think there can be no question about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know what the pleasure of the Senate is about acting upon this matter to-night, Mr. President, but I have just this to say:

We have pending before the Senate in the shape of a conference report, as yet unacted upon, the so-called Sterling bill. The Sterling bill, of course, as we all recollect, forbids the use of malt liquors for medicinal purposes. The bill has not yet passed. We do not know when it will pass. We do not know that it will become law. In the meantime the Secretary of the Treasury, under the terms of existing law as interpreted by the Attorney General, has issued regulations governing the prescription of malt liquors for medicinal purposes. There is nothing upon the statute books of the United States which will place an adequate tax upon such malt liquors. I propose that we tax malt liquors sold and distributed for medicinal purposes under the provisions of law and in accordance with the regulations at the rate of 60 cents per gallon.

The Sterling bill, as yet unpassed, does not forbid the sale of wine for medicinal purposes. If the Sterling bill should pass, wine could still be used for medicinal purposes, and in fact that bill places certain restrictions upon the use of wine for those purposes. The regulations issued day before yesterday by the Secretary of the Treasury provide additional regulations for the use of wine. It is legal to-day, and not a proposal of a serious nature has been made in either branch of Congress to do anything about placing an adequate tax upon wine used for those purposes. Surely no one can object to placing such a tax upon wine. My proposal is to place a tax of $1.20 per gallon upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is little or no tax imposed in the pending revenue measure, or in any other revenue law, upon spirituous liquors withdrawn and sold for medicinal purposes. My colleague [Mr. CALDER], I think, first noticed that omission in existing statutes, and upon a prior occasion offered an amendment, or certainly discussed the matter before the Finance Committee, providing that spirituous liquors should be taxed when withdrawn and sold for medicinal purposes. The Sterling bill permits it, present law permits it, and literally millions of gallons of spirituous liquors have been withdrawn during the last 10 or 12 months and used for medicinal purposes, and little has been collected from it. This combination amendment of my colleague and myself is to accomplish just those three things, to tax the malt liquor as long as it is legal as a medicinal beverage, to tax the wine, and to tax the spirituous liquors.

We have had some estimates made as to what may be expected from the amendment in the way of income to the Federal Government. Based upon the withdrawals for medicinal purposes of distilled spirits or spirituous liquors as they have been going on during the last year we will get, under this tax of $6.40 a gallon, anywhere between $20,000,000 and $40,000,000.

Mr. CALDER. More than last year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. More than last year; yes. We got hardly anything last year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that there was no tax upon alcohol withdrawn——

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a tax of $2.20, I should have said. This makes it $6.40. That was my error.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; and also a tax upon wine.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, but look at the wine taxes—14 cents and 12 cents a gallon. I have seen all that, and I say "no tax" because it amounts to nothing. There is no provision of law whatsoever, and the Senator knows it, to meet the new situation under the eighteenth amendment of the sale of alcoholic beverages for medicinal purposes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the proposal of the Senator is a very important one, and I think it ought to go over until to-morrow. I hope the Senator will let it go over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I simply finish my statement? Then the Senate may do as it pleases.

The best estimate that can be made about the revenue which may be expected from the sale of wines for medicinal purposes is $12,000,000. We get these figures from the best authority that we have at our disposal—from the Treasury Department. As to the revenue to be expected from the sale of beer for medicinal purposes, the figures are unobtainable; we do not know; but from the wine and spirits—which are bound to be taxed in one way or another some day, and the tax belongs in this bill; it ought to go into effect when this bill goes into effect—we will have a revenue of at least thirty or forty million dollars. I invite the attention of Senators to the possibilities of revenue from this situation. It is not to be despised.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah a question. To what extent are medicines taxed in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Proprietary medicines?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. I assume that there is a tax on proprietary medicines.

Mr. SMOOT. As the bill is reported to the Senate, they are not taxed at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No medicines?

Mr. SMOOT. No medicines.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The alcohol that is in the medicines is taxed, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. That is taxed; yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If beer should be made a medicine, why should there be a tax on it?

Mr. SMOOT. For the same reason that alcohol is taxed when it goes into all sorts of medicines.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is very little alcohol in beer, as I understand, and not much revenue would be obtained from it; but my idea was, what was the theory of the committee as to making medicines cost more to sick persons?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this is not a committee amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know; but the point is, if medicines are not taxed, if the policy of the Government is to keep them as cheap as possible for the sick people of the country, and if beer and wine are medicines, I should assume that the policy of the committee would apply to beer or wine as well as to other medicines.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason I can give the Senator is that it is a question of revenue, and it can be collected very easily from the alcohol in wine.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah why the committee has raised the tax on medicated alcohol from $4 and something——

Mr. SMOOT. From $2.20 to $6.40.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Has it not gone to $12?

Mr. SMOOT. No. I will say to the Senator that the committee has not acted upon it at all as a committee.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That was the information that came to me.

Mr. SMOOT. The proposition was a bloc proposition.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that that is not before the Senate at all. There is no proposition here at all to increase the tax on the alcohol that goes into medicine.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I am very glad to have that information.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement touching this amendment. I think the statement made by the Senator from New York——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want to make a statement now if we intend to take a recess at this time?

Mr. WILLIS. I was endeavoring to make the statement in order to get a recess. I think we ought not to take up this matter to-night, in view of its importance.

Mr. SMOOT. It is quite evident that this matter can not be disposed of to-night, and I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that motion for a moment——

Mr. SMOOT. I withhold it.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I renew my motion, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, October 28, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, October 27, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, O hear us. By prayer and entreaty we would ask that our hearts be fashioned for the purest music and our minds fixed for the noblest ends. May the thoughts we think, the words we speak, and the work we do be so pure, true, and honest that they shall be fit to live another day and thus the world be made better than it was before. Forgive us if we are selfish; recall us if we are estray; rebuke us if we are untrue; and cleanse us from all secret faults. In every way may we so value this present life that we may constantly realize it to be an everlasting echo of that life without end. When we have lived our little day and finished our earthly course, O may we be permitted to bow down in the presence of the holy of holies through Thy undying compassion and because of the things which we have done. In the holy name of Jesus, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESOLUTION TO EXPEL A MEMBER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the resolution which is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming calls up for consideration the privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas THOMAS L. BLANTON, Representative from the seventeenth district of the State of Texas, did on October 4, 1921, ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD "upon the improvements in the Government Printing Office," which consent was granted by the House; and

Whereas under such permission the said THOMAS L. BLANTON did insert and cause to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, October 22, 1921, grossly indecent and obscene language, unworthy of a Member of the House of Representatives, contrary to the rules of the House, derogatory to its dignity, and in violation of its confidence: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said THOMAS L. BLANTON, by his conduct as aforesaid, has forfeited all right to sit as a Representative in the Sixty-seventh Congress, and is hereby expelled and declared to be no longer a Member of this House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall consume but a few moments at this time, and I assume that at the conclusion of my statement the Member from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] will desire to be heard in his own right; and as under the practice of the House he can not yield in his time, I assume some gentleman will desire to be recognized in his own right in opposition to the resolution. I hope we may be able to dispose of the matter before us in the three hours suggested. Mr. Speaker, the preamble of the resolution before us sufficiently sets out the basis of the indictment against the Member from the seventeenth district of Texas to enable Members familiar as they are with the rules and practice of the House, and familiar as they have been obliged to become under their oaths with the matter complained of, that so far as information or argument to the Members are concerned little further need be said. Mr. Speaker, the public is not so well informed, and what we do to-day must not only be in accordance with our oaths but must be performed so that we may, so far as it is possible in a case like this, lay before the public the facts on which we render our judgment. Unfortunately, the subject matter forming the basis of the charge against the Member from the seventeenth district of Texas is of such a character that it can not be presented upon this floor.

Were I to recite or ask to be read even a portion of these words of offense I should myself be subject to expulsion. Anyone uttering in public anywhere the words placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the Member from Texas would be subject to fine and imprisonment under the laws of the land. While we can not repeat the words which form the basis of this charge, it can be said without exaggeration that they are unspeakable, vile, foul, filthy, profane, blasphemous, and obscene. There is not a Member here who has read the letter complained of—and all Members must have read it because it is their duty in deciding this case so to do—who will not say that it is the vilest thing he ever saw in print. Mr. Speaker, the privilege of extending one's remarks in the RECORD is one long enjoyed, greatly appreciated, and very seldom abused. In all the history of the Congress I recall no case where, under such a leave to print, profane or obscene language has been printed in the RECORD or offered to the Public Printer for printing. The Member from the seventeenth district of Texas on the 4th day of October asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD upon "improvements in the Government Printing Office," but no manuscript was presented to the Public Printer under that leave until the evening of Saturday, October 22, 18 days later.

Between the hour of 6 and 7 on the evening of that day the messenger of the House, detailed from the Printing Office for that duty, received from Mr. BLANTON'S own hand a manuscript—I hold the manuscript in my hand—on the back of which was written a direction that it should be printed in the RECORD of that day without fail. Under the rules of the Government Printing Office——

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Was the direction signed?

Mr. MONDELL. The direction was signed by Mr. BLANTON. Under the rules of the Printing Office, as they understand them, there was no option but to print this manuscript and all contained therein, and it was sent to the presses about midnight of Saturday, and before the dawn of the Sabbath day this vile, foul thing, printed at Government expense, was being sent, also at Government expense, by fast express trains to every State, every county, every hamlet in the land, into the schools, the colleges, the universities, into thousands of American homes. The language it contains, placed there by the Member from Texas, would, under the laws passed by Congress, subject anyone now mailing it to imprisonment for five years and a fine of $5,000. It was presented to the Public Printing Office at a time when there could be no reference of the matter to anyone in authority in Congress. It was late Saturday night, on a day when the Congress was not in session, and by the early dawn it was on the wings of the wind, carrying its poison to the ends of the earth.

It would have been bad enough, Mr. Speaker, had the Member from the seventeenth district of Texas attempted to have this letter, purporting to recount a vile, miserable squabble between two employees in the Printing Office, read on the floor, where he would have been halted at the first word, and if he had attempted to proceed he would have been subject to immediate expulsion. In that event no word of this vileness would have gone into the RECORD. But under leave to print, in violation of the confidence of the House, surreptitiously, this vile thing that could not have been presented on the floor was sent into the households of the land. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it was sent out carrying on its face all the usual evidences of delivery on the floor of the House. While the first paragraph, if carefully read, might have suggested to an informed reader that these statements, these letters, these excerpts, had not been uttered or read on the floor, the entire manuscript is filled with those addresses to the Speaker which are only logical or usual in the case of a speech made on the floor of the House. In the middle of the first column, "But, Mr. Speaker"; in the middle of the second column, "Now, Mr. Speaker"; in the latter part of the fourth column, "Of course, Mr. Speaker"; in the upper portion of the next column, "Mr. Speaker"; at the bottom of the same column, "About that time, Mr. Speaker."

And so on, through the 19 columns in the RECORD, there are 15 addresses to the Speaker, as though all this had been spoken on the floor; as though you and I and all of us had listened to this vile letter and made no protest against it.

Mr. Speaker, men sometimes do things in anger for which we should forgive them. Men sometimes commit crimes under sudden uncontrollable impulse for which they are entitled to our pity. But, Mr. Speaker, this crime against the House, its dignity, its honor—this crime against decency, against every law and usage of civilized man, was committed deliberately, intentionally, without regard for the law, for decency, or for the honor of this House. There is only one proper or adequate course of action, that is to expel from the House one who has been guilty of these acts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] if he desires to be heard.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am filing with the record clerk of the House my revised and extended speech on the railroad situation. I am calling attention to it in order to give the entire membership of the House under the new rules the opportunity to inspect it, and pass on it, and censor it. If there is anything improper in it, they will exercise their right to cut whatever they may deem necessary out of it. I do not want to abuse any of their senses of justice and right. But they are my remarks as I deem they should be made under my oath as a Representative of the people of this Government.

Mr. Speaker, if the current reports are true, this will be my last speech in the House of Representatives, and the occasion is of more importance to me than it is to you. It is more important to me than it is to the curious who have gathered here.

In the laws that we pass here, Mr. Speaker, governing the conduct of citizens, concerning one charged with an offense for which punishment may be inflicted, we require that he must be confronted with witnesses whom he has the right to cross-examine, and after he has been given due time to prepare for his trial, and when a prima facie case is established against him by competent testimony, beyond a reasonable doubt, he is given an opportunity to present his own witnesses, to be heard by counsel, and, upon conviction, has an appeal. There is no appeal from a conviction by you in this case. I am denied all these privileges, and a conviction in this case, on account of the special manner in which the resolution has been drawn, means that if every one of the 314,000 constituents of mine living in the seventeenth district of Texas should desire to send me back here you would not let me come. So you have provided that there is no appeal.

In an effort to help ward off the pending railroad strike I addressed a number of leading business men of New York last Friday, without any remuneration, and paying my own expenses. For months I have been working overtime in my office. The War Risk Bureau down here could tell you part of the reason why. This delayed my printing the data compiled on the Government Printing Office until Saturday. Knowing its importance to two humble citizens of the United States, neither being of my party or from my State, who had appealed to me as a Representative of this Government for protection under the Constitution in their guaranteed rights, I delivered such remarks to the messenger, Mr. Sam Robinson, about 6 or 7 or 8 o'clock—I have not a definite remembrance as to the exact time—in the evening of last Saturday, requesting that the same be published that night without fail in the RECORD.

In every offense against the law the main ingredient is the intent. Who has sought in this case to ascertain the intent? As God is my witness, I had no intent other than protecting citizens in their rights guaranteed under the Constitution and being of service to my country under my oath through apprising Congress and the administration of the awful conditions existing in the Printing Office. Desperate situations demand extreme means.

During my eight years as district judge there were printed in appealed records and appellate decisions foul evidence of all kinds, not my language, but the testimony of witnesses given in the court, where a mixed audience came at will to hear it. It went through the mails constantly and into the libraries of every State. In each case I required all improper words to be abbreviated so as to veil their significance. Volumes of similar records from every State in the Union are in the libraries of every State in this Union, having been transmitted through the United States mails and mailable under our laws. Throughout my entire remarks on the Government Printing Office in Saturday's RECORD there is not one improper word used by me, and the sole and only document therein that has improper language in it is the one sworn affidavit by a Government employee that was filed with the Public Printer, evidencing how he had been shamefully abused to the extent of forcing him to resign his position—a culmination against which I had been fighting for months. The records show that two at least of my colleagues were not familiar with the conditions there. I wanted all of you to know about it, and I had only one way to apprise you of this fact, which was through the medium of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which outside of your offices, unfortunately, is not generally read by numerous people over the country. I caused all improper words to be abbreviated and veiled exactly in the same manner as is done on the official court records in Texas. Exactly such a course was pursued by the Government Printing Office itself when printing House Document No. 157, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, which contained a report of Director John B. Densmore, of the manner in which he established and used the dictagraph in the office of the prosecuting attorney at San Francisco to obtain hoped-for evidence. There is the document, which various persons have mailed generally, if any gentleman would like to see it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman mind lifting his voice a little for the benefit of those of us back in the Hall?

Mr. BLANTON. I have been up all night long—that is, without sleep all night long, last night and most of the night before—thinking this case over. If I can not make the gentleman back there hear me, I am sure he will excuse me. I hope he will not take up my time, however, because I have just a few minutes—that is, compared with what would be required to make a proper defense in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Alabama may have been misunderstood by the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Alabama simply asked that the gentleman raise his voice.

Mr. BLANTON. Physical possibilities are involved, Mr. Speaker, and that idea was embraced within my answer.

One of the ablest lawyers in New York advised me that this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD report of my remarks is mailable and that it is not unusual for such public proceedings connected with laws, lawmaking, and law-enforcing bodies to be thus compiled and printed and carried through the mails.

Last Monday when, without my knowledge of his intention until the House convened, the majority leader moved to strike out all of my remarks, my own as well as this employee's affidavit, from the RECORD, I naturally requested that I be permitted to have 10 minutes in which to explain my position. It was denied me, and the entire remarks were stricken from the RECORD by a vote of 313 to 1.

Mr. Speaker, it is not contended by anyone that any of the balance of those remarks, with the sole exception of this Government employee's affidavit, has any obscene or improper or indecent language in them whatever. With such affidavit stricken out, I ask my colleagues, in justice to me and my good name and in justice to the good name of my family and my children and children's children, to let the balance of that speech go in the RECORD in connection with my present remarks. I ask such unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman objects, I will not urge it further.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MONDELL. Any gentleman who can print anything of the vileness of that letter should not have leave to print any remarks in the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I always obey the rules of the House and stand for law and order. I am a law-abiding man. I believe in order. The only purpose that the people of this Government have for a Congress is to provide machinery whereby the rights guaranteed them under the Constitution may be accorded them.

Hoping also to help avert the present railway crisis I had agreed to address certain business men at Wheeling, W. Va., on last Tuesday, and I left here Monday night and went there, and the newspaper headlines began to confront me the next day. The New York Tribune yesterday announced that BLANTON was to be expelled for printing a vile speech in the RECORD, intimating it was my language that was vile. Other papers said that a number of my colleagues intended to introduce resolutions, but that the steering committee had met, passed on my case, deemed that I should be expelled, and had this resolution specially prepared, and that they had taken the matter in charge. I do not rebel against the action of the steering committee. They have a right to take action and push it when they think best. One newspaper said that I had caused much trouble to my colleagues ever since I had been in Congress; that I had refused to follow the leadership, and I had caused the majority leader much trouble, and that I had caused the minority leader much trouble. And I have; I must admit it. I can not say that it was done through ignorance of the rules, although it did not seem to me to be against the rules. I came here from a district in west Texas, believing that the Representative of the seventeenth district of Texas had an equal place here, the same as the majority leader and the same as the minority leader. I came here believing that it was the duty of a representative of the people to think and act his sentiments and his judgment, and not to be led on everything. I have been led in instances by the majority leader. There have been times when I thought that he was fundamentally right, and I have followed him when I have been alone on the Democratic side, not a Democrat going with me. There have been numerous times when I followed the minority leader, when I thought he was right. But there have been times when I could not follow him. My judgment was not the same as his.

I am sorry that I have to speak extemporaneously now; my written record gave out before I started good. I did not have time to prepare a written statement and I must depend upon your indulgence, because in speaking here I know that every word I utter is weighed against me, just as I used to warn some defendants when they came in court, "Every word that you may say will be used against you, and not for you." I have told many a one that. And on account of these newspaper reports, which were still confronting me before I got back to Washington—for instance, the New York Times said that two of my colleagues from Texas took the stand that there was a political question in this, a United States Senatorship at stake, and that that must be considered, and that they hoped I would not be kicked out of Congress because it might affect that race. And the New York Times further says—I want to be exact, because I do not want to misquote anybody—that in reply: "The Republicans state they insist that Mr. BLANTON is not a desirable Member for any legislative body and should be expelled, and that such expulsion would be his political end."

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Unless the gentleman cheerfully yields, I shall not ask him.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask the gentleman in all kindness to let me proceed until I get some remarks before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Then when I get through I shall be glad to answer any Member who asks me a question.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. It is particularly pertinent just now.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry. Yesterday's New York Times has that to say. I am particular about it because this is what the people of my native land are reading. You talk about censure and punishment—punishment.

No man who ever went upon the scaffold and gave his life, when he felt that it was unjust, has been punished more than I have been in this newspaper notoriety.

Democrats of House line up to aid BLANTON.

With a good motive? As friends? To help me, to protect me in rights? To see that I get justice? I wish you had. I know that this paper has not stated their position correctly, but here is what it states to the country. Here is where the punishment comes in:

Belief felt that his expulsion from Congress would be political boomerang.

Politics? Is that entering into this trial?

By International News Service:

With the Texas Senatorship at stake the House Democrats to-day lined up as many of their fellows as possible to vote against the resolution for the expulsion of Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON of Texas, charged with violation of the rules and dignity of the House in causing to be inserted unprintable matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

BLANTON is a candidate for the United States Senate to succeed Senator CULBERSON, who is not expected to make the race again. There are a number of other candidates seeking the support of the Democratic voters.

The Texas delegation conferred to-day on the political situation in Texas and the possible effect on it of the expulsion of BLANTON. There is a lively apprehension that votes to support the resolution for his expulsion by the Texans and by Democrats generally will be seized upon by BLANTON and converted to political profit.

In a time like this——

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. I beg pardon. I hope I will not be interrupted for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I am just telling you what the country is reading just now. Let me read further:

Members of the delegation said they would vote to censure BLANTON, but not to expel him. They fear that to expel him will enable him to assume the rôle of martyr in his plea for vindication, with the result that the State might send him to the Senate. With many senatorial candidates in the primaries a few votes could dominate the final choice.

It is known that BLANTON will urge in the event of expulsion or censure that he is being persecuted by the House because of his antagonism to organized and union labor. He has gained strength in Texas through his bitter attacks on union labor and his frequent charges that the House is influenced by Samuel Gompers and other labor leaders.

Mr. Speaker, I have never given the International News Service or the Texas delegation authority to announce me for the Senate from my State. I have never given any newspaper in this land such authority. If you were going to run for office, would you not prefer to make your own announcement? Would you not prefer in all fairness to a man whose seat in Congress and whose good name is involved, to keep politics out of such a situation as this? But that is what I have been reading, and all of these things have led me to believe that, unlike a candidate usually is, it causes me to believe I am not altogether "in the hands of my friends."

But what is there I can offer bearing on the question of intent in this case, I ask my colleagues? What has been my life since childhood? Have I been guilty of these alleged acts constantly and repeatedly? Has my character been that? That bears upon the intent.

Let me give you a little chronological history. I want you to know something about the man you are going to kick out of Congress to-day—his whole life—because this resolution was presented in the House and published in the press and sent to the country on my forty-ninth birthday. Forty-nine years I had lived in this land. What had I been guilty of during those 49 years? What act involving moral turpitude in my whole life?

In their indorsement which about 200 of the leading citizens of my home county voluntarily signed and published when I announced myself as a candidate for district judge in 1908 they said:

We hereby indorse and heartily recommend THOMAS L. BLANTON. He enjoys the confidence and esteem of the citizens of this county and of those elsewhere who know him, and he may be counted upon in every emergency which affects the good of our homes and the welfare of our families.

The old residents of Houston, Tex., will tell you that about 40 years ago my sisters and little brothers and myself voluntarily gave up to creditors our home that still stands in Houston at the corner of Fannin and Lamar Streets, in the very heart of that city. When there was an exemption law that protected a homestead against debts, yet we paid a hundred cents on the dollar with our home. They will tell you that I went to the country with my sisters and little brothers, a lad 10 years of age, the principal breadwinner of the family, and farmed a dairy farm on shares, getting up at 4 o'clock in the morning and milking a dozen cows and selling the milk and farming through the day and trying to get an education at night. They will tell you that the newspapers are mistaken when they say in all of this connection that BLANTON is an enemy to the man who labors, and later I did the same at La Grange, Tex. At 18 years of age I went to Austin, Tex., the capital of my State, where is situated the university, and I got a position as deliveryman on a delivery wagon with the firm of Hill & Hill there, wholesale and retail grocers, who have been in the business for all these years and are still in the business there, and from their delivery wagon I delivered groceries at the back door of practically every home then in the capital of my native State, and by hard work was promoted first to a clerkship, then city solicitor, then bookkeeper, and then by keeping their books at night for five long years, earning every dollar of my expenses as I went I took a three-year academic course in our State university, and also a full law degree. I began the practice of law in Bill Ramsey's office in Cleburne, Tex., with only $1.50 in my pocket. That is the history of many of you. I deserve no credit for my hard work—none in the world.

A practice of 12 long years before the courts of our country brought me a lucrative business to take care of my growing family, enabled me to acquire a little ranch and get together a little bunch of horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs, with a splendid home in the town, with my own water works running from my ranch to my house, with my own lighting system in my home, and with everything to make life pleasant to a man. I had one client, a cattleman, who paid me as much as $5,000 a year for attending to his business. But I later on foolishly went into politics and ran for district judge and was elected and served eight years. Was I guilty of any high misdemeanor during this time? Let us see.

During my eight years on the district bench I received from many people letters similar to the one I will now quote. Let me read this one from Dr. C. C. Coleman, then pastor of the First Baptist Church, of Abilene, but later of the First Baptist Church, of Waco, Tex.:

ABILENE, TEX., January 16, 1911.

Judge THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Abilene, Tex.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I wish to say that your course on the bench has given me a world of fresh hope for our institutions. You have demonstrated that a fearless, patriotic judge can do wonders in spite of cumbersome precedents and methods of procedure and a prevailing laxity of public opinion. I have often thanked God that we have you on this bench. I have lived in sections of the State where the judge had a very different spirit from yours, and all who stood for law and order keenly felt the difference. Wishing you increasing influence and usefulness.

Heartily, yours,
C. C. COLEMAN.

Now, let me read from the Western Evangel, a Baptist magazine then published in my home city of Abilene, Tex.:

[From the Western Evangel, Abilene, Tex. Issue of Mar. 13, 1912.]

Mr. BLANTON, although the youngest district judge in Texas at present, has been in active practice of law for 15 years. His public record and private life are very commendable. It is in order to say that Judge BLANTON is a stanch prohibitionist, and is one of the wisest, most earnest, conscientious supporters of the cause. He is always on the right side of every moral question, he being a true Christian gentleman.

Here is one from a former president of the Farmers Union of Texas.

GORMAN, TEX., July 8, 1912.

Judge THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Eastland, Tex.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I am glad to see the people standing by you. I love true men, and you have proven to me that you are a true man, and ready at any time to brave the powers that be in defense of the rights of the people. The people are with you and will be with you to the end. You have proven to the people that you want good government, and some time I hope to see the people make you governor. God bless you.

Yours, truly,
D. J. NEILL.

AUGUST, 1912.

THE HOME AND STATE.

Judge BLANTON, of Abilene, was triumphantly reelected district judge of that district. He has been one of the most faithful officials, administering the laws fairly and justly to all alike, and the people have again rewarded him for faithful service. When men like Judge BLANTON are on the bench the law and order of the community are in safe hands.

Here is an indorsement voluntarily signed and given me by numerous leading citizens of the forty-second judicial district in 1916:

We, the undersigned, heartily indorse Judge THOMAS L. BLANTON for Congress. During his eight years as district judge he has faithfully kept every promise made to the people, has impartially enforced the laws without fear or favor, has kept strict order, has dispatched business and cleared the dockets, has forced all citizens alike to do service as jurors and witnesses, and has economically conducted the courts.

His honesty, integrity, ability, and unsurpassed energy are such as would make him an ideal Congressman. We know him to be fair and impartial in passing upon all questions. We have had every occasion to observe his manly worth and sterling qualities. Judge BLANTON made a wonderful success in the practice of law, and his conduct on the bench has been of the highest type. In his private life he has advocated that which was pure and right, always fighting openly all kinds of vice, and he has given his time and money in the defense of all moral issues that have come before the people of his State.

NEW YORK, March 9, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I want to congratulate you on the splendid fight you are making against extravagance, and against the raids made upon the United States Treasury. You are doing a wonderful work for the people, and they appreciate it. I hope that your health and strength will continue that you may be able to fight this to the end. I am,

Very truly, yours,
C. U. BURKETT,
Editor American Agriculturist.

This is from a leading national farmers' representative:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: As director representing agriculture in the Mississippi Valley Association, embracing about 26 States, I wish to say that if the farmers of our Nation had a few more men in Congress who understand their needs as you do and who would serve their interests as you have done normal prosperity would return more rapidly, for when our farmers are prosperous all other interests in our Nation prosper accordingly.

Not only are the farmers of Texas indebted to you for your defense of agriculture, but the farmers of the Nation as well owe you a debt of gratitude, and I believe not only the farmers but those engaged in banking, industrial, and mercantile pursuits in your district will thoroughly appreciate the services you have rendered. With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,
R. D. BOWEN.

This is from the famous southern editor, evangelist, and lecturer:

ROSSLYN, VA., July 26, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Abilene, Tex.

MY DEAR JUDGE: Here's three cheers and a tiger for the signal victory of a real man—one who had the courage and patriotism to put up a two-fisted fight. I shall rejoice to see you assume, with added popular commission, your eminent services in the House. With most cordial regards,

Faithfully,
SAM W. SMALL.

[From Hon. Joseph H. Hurley, president of the City Employees' Association, embracing the several thousand city employees in the District of Columbia which has ceased to affiliate with the American Federation of Labor.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 17, 1920.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Member of Congress Seventeenth District, Abilene, Tex.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: This organization, which is made up of the employees of the District government, at its last meeting took up your record since coming to the Congress of the United States as a Member. It gives me great pleasure to announce to you that nothing was uncovered which could be considered as at all discreditable to you. We went into consideration of your record as it pertained to labor very thoroughly, and, while we differed with you in some respects as concerned minor matters, in the main we find that as regards the larger aspects of labor your votes and speeches were consistently used for the interests of those who toil with their hands.

We, of course, are aware that certain organizations and interests have been captiously critical of you, but our investigation has not justified them in the continuance of this attitude. We believe that men like yourself who are filling high positions should not be subject to harassment at the hands of those who have selfish interests to be served.

In the opinion of the men and women who work for the city government in this the Capital City of this great Nation, the interests of the seventeenth congressional district of Texas, nor any other district represented in Congress, has ever been more worthily and faithfully served than by the present incumbent from the seventeenth, yourself, and it is our hope that the intelligence displayed in sending you here in 1916 will continue to manifest itself for many years to come, and will eventuate in sending you to the Senate when Senator CULBERSON retires in the near future.

Very sincerely, yours, JOSEPH H. HURLEY.

And, Mr. Speaker, let me say to the union men in this House who are Republicans that during the last campaign my own Democratic Party renominated me by an overwhelming majority, and your Republican Party in my district held a convention and indorsed my record by not putting out a Republican candidate against me, and this is what Col. Mose Harris, a distinguished Republican editor of Texas, said in the leading Republican paper of my State, published in San Antonio, Tex.:

[From the Texas Republic, issue of Aug. 28, 1920.]

The renomination of Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON was a deserved tribute to and a merited recognition of the services of an honest, able, and courageous representative of the people. May his tribe increase.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that the issue here is not to be decided by what my people want in the seventeenth district of Texas. It is not what the people of Texas want. It is not what the people of the United States want as to whether or not I remain in the House of Representatives, as it is a matter solely within your hands. You have the right to make charges against any man here and send him out. You are the sole judges, and there is no appeal. I have been told by friends—one of them came to me the other day and asked me about the striking out of my remarks from the RECORD. I considered him a friend and that his interrogation was friendly. He wanted to know what I was going to do about it. I said, "I am going to try and have a number of copies of the RECORD printed and put in the hands of as many people as I can and let them pass upon the question of whether I exceeded my duty as a Representative."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. Now that is used against me. Why, the Associated Press from Wheeling carried a paragraph in the Star yesterday in which it said that I said there were no improper words in the article. Do you believe that I said that? They have sent newspaper reporter after reporter to me within the last 48 hours, and to everyone I said, "Wait until I am before my colleagues in the House, because I know I will be misinterpreted." Let me ask you if you believed you had done nothing wrong and your colleagues disagreed with you, but you did not fall out about that, but you felt that your good name and that of your wife and your children and their children called for the public of the United States to pass upon your guilt or innocence, as well as it was the duty of your colleagues, what would you do? I want to say that among all the many strange phenomena that appear to us in daily life, among the greatest miracles that our Lord has created—and he has created many—the strangest thing to me in all the world is the fact that as many human beings as he has placed on the earth he has never placed two exactly alike. He has differentiated between them all. We are different in our characteristics, in our physiognomies, viewpoint, our height, and the way we think and how we look at things.

You all might be practically of one mind here, and yet your constituents might be of different minds. You can not tell. We get into an atmosphere here where one can not tell much about the outside. To show you how other people look at these things—and I know you are not controlled by what other people think, and you are going to act on your own initiative, as you have a right to do——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point? His answer to this question which I wish to ask him may influence a number of votes in this House.

Mr. BLANTON. Just a moment. I must get these facts into the RECORD before I yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. How do others think about it? Not my people in Texas, but this organization of business men in Wheeling, W. Va., whom I addressed there the other night on the railroad question—an organization of Republicans, if you please, antagonistic to me in party politics. I placed before their secretary, Dr. Joseph A. Meagher, who for a time under the director was in charge of the main business of the War Risk Bureau here until a short time ago, a copy of this RECORD, and I asked him to read it from one end to the other—this same RECORD upon which I am to be expelled, and he told me he had read it. He sends me now, voluntarily, without my knowing anything about it, this telegram from West Virginia, which I desire to read:

WHEELING, W. VA., October 26, 1921—12.02 p. m.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The following telegram has been sent to our Representatives in Congress and in the Senate:

"This association, comprising 400 executives of financial, industrial, commercial, wholesale and retail, and contracting enterprises, second to none in this country, under whose supervision come a personnel of 50,000 employees, unanimously urge you to use your efforts to prevent the success of any attempt on the part of Congress to deprive THOMAS L. BLANTON of his seat in the House of Representatives."

That telegram is signed by the Industrial Relations Association of Wheeling, W. Va., and is signed by H. E. Field, president, and by J. A. Meagher, manager, and by several others.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM. The gentleman has referred to my home State and to my fellow citizens, who have sent me a telegram, and I would like to have a question answered.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be interrupted.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of constitutional privilege. No citizen can be attacked in this House without being protected.

Mr. BLANTON. Gentlemen, I am "in the hands of my friends." I know that this is an occasion when every man who has a spleen against me of any kind has an opportunity now to dig me, so come on with it. I have among my colleagues some friends. Job had them, but some of mine are real friends, good loyal friends, not the kind that Job had. Some, however, came to me, and so anxious were they about my interests that in their anxiety they overlooked a great principle in life. They said, "BLANTON, get up before the House and apologize to the House, and tell them you did wrong and ask their mercy, and they will not put you out." I remained awake all night last night trying out that very question, trying to decide in my own mind, in my own heart, with my conscience and my God as company, whether I had done more or less than my duty as a Representative, when people of this country had appealed to me to see that their constitutional rights were upheld—to determine whether or not I have done less or more than my duty in what I did, whether I had done injury to my fellow man, whether I had hurt and harmed my colleagues or any of them, or whether I have done hurt or harm to the House of Representatives of which I am a Member. Gentlemen, if I could have convinced myself that I had done wrong, I would be willing to get on my knees to every man in this House and beg his forgiveness. I would have come to you voluntarily like a man, and I would have gotten on my knees to say that I had done wrong, and I would have asked you to forgive me. But do you think, when I have a deep conscientious feeling that I have done nothing but my duty, that I would buy my office at any such price? This office means much to me. When I came here I was fairly well-to-do. In the fight that I have been making conscientiously and earnestly since I have been here to prevent this Government from becoming sovietized, I have spent piece of property after piece of property. I caused first one fine bungalow to be sold and sacrificed, and then another, and my good wife consented each time. She has made sacrifices daily. Finally, when it seemed that the infamous "Plum plan" was about to be hatched and foisted on this country, when all personal and property rights would be jeopardized, and when it would not be a decent place in which to live, I found I could not carry the fight on any further without more funds. I had long before sold my ranch and live stock. I then went to my wife and said, "There is but one way in the world in which I can carry on this fight, and that is to sell our home. Are you willing?" And she with our five children agreed to do it. We had a position carrying a salary on which we could live—and I want to say that through very economical living and reserving but a bare living for my family, I have spent every dollar of that salary in this work. She agreed to sell our home, and we sold it, and I spent practically every dollar of it in this work.

When you kick me out to-day, after paying all my debts I shall go home with borrowed money to pay my railroad fare; but I am not using that as any excuse for your action. I merely mention it to show that my fight has been earnestly made. You have the power to kick me out, if you think best, and I shall take my medicine. They say that I am a hard fighter, but my fight seems to be over in this House. Show me an adversary that I have ever hit beneath the belt or hit when he was down. Show me one. I am a fighter, but I am a fair fighter.

I have never said one word about the House of Representatives or its Members on the outside that I have not stood before you face to face and said it to your teeth. And I am a man who never squawks when my adversary's cold steel pierces my vitals. Gentlemen, I do not apologize to you, because in my inner consciousness of heart, with God as my witness, I do not believe that I have done wrong or that I have done anything more than my duty. I shall take my medicine when you act to-day. Resign? It was suggested that I resign. If your people had given you a solemn commission and you had brought it to Washington and you had been working day and night in their service, with the Constitution of your country, your God, and your conscience as your guide, would you send that commission back to your people or would you retain it? I can not send it back to them. You gentlemen have the power to do it, and when you send it back they have no appeal.

To show you that all people do not look on things as you do, here is a telegram that came from one of the greatest men in this Nation—Fred Cockrell, of Texas. His late distinguished father served faithfully in this House, from my own district.

His father's brother was a distinguished United States Senator from the State of Missouri, the late Senator Francis Cockrell. Judge Fred Cockrell has read this RECORD, every word. He takes it, has copies on file and reads it daily, and here is what Cockrell says:

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

If Mondell resolution passes—

Now, he, too, mentions this question of politics in the case. He has seen the papers. Politics concerning a man who could not now run for the office of justice of the peace, because when you take his seat away from him he will be just like your steering committee decided, like your majority leader decided, if the paper reports you all correctly, when it said, "The Republicans would not censure him as his Democratic friends wanted. They would expel him, because it would end him politically." "That they wanted to get rid of me; I had caused roll calls, and so forth"——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has referred to me; will he now yield for me to say——

Mr. BLANTON. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will take his own time because I have——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has referred to my attitude. May I say to him that the first man who suggested expulsion was on his side?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, do not take this out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Fred Cockrell says:

If Mondell resolution passes book me for as many speeches for reelection to House or Senate as my physical ability will permit. If the Printing Office is so foul that indecent language alone will reach it, then publish it as it is.

FRED COCKRELL.

I saw in the press that the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] had a resolution to expel me that was more drastic even than the one drafted by the Republican steering committee and I wondered why out in Nebraska Members should have an additional feeling of resentment. I can not account for it at all, but it is only fair that I should mention that a few days ago, under your unanimous consent, I discussed the question of fraternal organizations using war conditions to commit fraud upon their policyholders. There is a fraternal organization with its home office in Nebraska, the Woodmen of the World. I have made numerous Woodmen speeches in my State gratuitously in the last 21 years, urging the poor men of my State to join it as a fraternal organization with insurance protection. I never received a dollar for such a speech in my life. I even paid my own expenses. It was to help my fellowmen, the poor men of my country. There are 900,000 members of that organization in the United States, all poor men, and I showed that in 1919 it admitted, because the actuaries and auditors passed on its accounts and so reported, that it was 62 per cent insolvent, and right in the face of being 62 per cent insolvent the president of that company in 1919 raised his own salary or caused it to be raised from $12,500 to $25,000 a year and then caused the clerk's salary to be raised from $10,000 to $15,000, and they raised the assessment on every man of the 900,000 members of that company. They placed a lien upon their policy of about $300 on each $1,000 and charged interest and said that if the interest was not paid it would accumulate and be held against the widow and children after death. The policy provided $100 for a tombstone. They took even that tombstone away, except under certain conditions. The worst part was they had a meeting in New York last July and the delegates to that convention in New York decided that they would not hold another meeting until the year 1925; 1925 was before they would hold another meeting, and in the meantime the president of that company will draw another $100,000 and the clerk will draw another $60,000 of the poor men's assessments that are paid over to protect their wives and little children when they die. I called upon that president and warned him that if he did not call a meeting in the early part of next year and did not notify the public that he would not draw that additional salary, that I would try to put his company in a Federal receivership. I do not know whether that had any effect on the additional feeling in the resolution from Nebraska or not.

I am where; I do not know where. Gentlemen, this is one of the most honored positions that can be conferred upon a man—to be in the House of Representatives. Some of the greatest men of this Nation have served here. I do not say anything against your protecting its honor, but other men have served here who were the enemies of this Government and that flag and Constitution, who gave help and encouragement to the foreign enemy during the war, and before you kicked them out you gave them several months' time for preparation for trial; you gave them counsel, you permitted them to cross-examine the witnesses appearing against them; you permitted them to do this and that. I am not complaining because you do not accord me the same privilege. You have the power not to do it. I just wanted to mention it, though. There have been other men here who have made speeches on the floor of this House against our war purposes, that some of you men considered were antagonistic to the purposes of this Government and to a certain extent were disloyal. I have not seen any action of expunging or the personal question of their expulsion.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion? You said in the beginning something about your intent. What was your intention in printing this? You have not said a word about that.

Mr. BLANTON. I thought I had mentioned that. I think I said my sole intent was to bring to the attenion of the Congress, as two Members showed in that RECORD they did not know these conditions—to bring to your attention, to the attention of the President of the United States, to the attention of the Vice President, and of the Cabinet this horrible condition in your Government Printing Office, whereby a man could not stay in there unless he joined a union, where unless he joined a union and paid his 10 per cent assessment for this 44-hour printers' strike in the United States he would be kicked out; or, if not kicked out, he would be insulted, with profane and obscene language used to such an extent that he would have to get out if he was a man of ordinary sensibility.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has read notices here this morning. Here is one from Wheeling, W. Va., printed in the Star—a supposed interview with the gentleman from Texas, in which this sentence is used:

Any woman or child could read all that I have printed without a single blush of shame.

I ask the gentleman if he said that?

Mr. BLANTON. I absolutely did not; and did not have any such interview.

A MEMBER. Ask him if he thinks so.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows I do not. Of course, if that matter had not been abbreviated it would have been improper to put in there for even men to read.

Mr. FUNK. Why did you put it in the RECORD so that they could read it?

Mr. BLANTON. Here is what I said to the reporter, and not for publication, and he told me he would not publish anything, just like these reporters here have promised me. I have talked to them, but they have been gentlemen, and they have kept my confidence. I told him what I said myself; I was accused of having made a vile speech; that of every word I said myself there was not a sentence of my own language in that that was improper and could not be used in the presence of women.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield? When inserting this in the RECORD was the gentleman not well aware that many thousands of these RECORDS would go to libraries and to debating societies, where women could read them and would read them? Is not the gentleman aware of that? Did he think that women could not interpret these abbreviations, and if they could interpret them was it proper to send them to the homes of America for women and children to read?

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer. I do not believe there would have been 20 women in the United States who would have read this article had not their attention been especially called to it

Mr. REAVIS. Would that have been the gentleman's fault?

Mr. BLANTON. One minute. In our home libraries, that each contains a volume, the greatest literary genius, that we all revere and love, Shakespeare, has profane and obscene words in there that I do not like my good little daughter to read, and Balzac has profane and obscene words in his writings that I do not like my little daughter to read—Balzac, that you let the schools of the country teach as one of the standard literary productions of his age. Why, the court records of every State are full of such things, and all of these books go through the mails; but young ladies do not read the obscene literature.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry that you took up in questions my few moments remaining.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 30 minutes. His seat in this House and his good name are involved, and I believe fair play calls for such an extension of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. When the Members become aware of the seriousness of this occasion and give me an opportunity, I will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. REAVIS. I understood the gentleman to say that he had spent most of the night in trying to come to what was his conscientious duty with reference to this House and this proceeding.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has heard me say that.

Mr. REAVIS. And that he had reached a conclusion he did not regret the occurrence and would not apologize.

Mr. BLANTON. I stated just exactly what the gentleman from Nebraska says, only not with that accent.

Mr. REAVIS. Eliminating the accent, I have stated the gentleman's position?

Mr. BLANTON. I said I did not feel that when an American citizen had been denied employment in his Government service, and he had appealed to a Congressman of the United States to protect him—and in his letter he not only appealed to me but he asked that the Congress of the United States protect him in his rights—and where he had been denied his rights, and where he had been forced to withdraw from the Government service because of the treatment he had received—I said that I would have been an infamous coward had I not brought the condition, the exact condition, not different from what it was, but just like it was—the exact condition, the record like it was, to the attention of the Representatives of this Government and let them pass upon whether the man had been accorded justice or not. It was a seeking after justice for an American citizen that I was after, and I thought over that subject all of last night; I revolved it in my mind from one side to the other. I had to do it from my own experience in life; I could not do it from yours. I could not look at it from your standpoint. I could not look at the facts from your viewpoint. I was the Representative of the seventeenth district of Texas. The Representative of the seventeenth district of Texas had to decide the question. I do not know what was in your minds. I revolved the question over and over, "What else than what I did could I have done to have brought that matter forcibly to the attention of my colleagues, hoping thereby that justice would be done?" Ah, to save my seat I should apologize, you indicate is in the minds of some of my friends; I should thus buy a seat in my Nation's legislative body at the sacrifice of honor. I should resort to buying it.

I come from a State where in 1836, in the historic old Alamo, at San Antonio, Col. William B. Travis drew out his sword and said, "Men who are brave, cross it in defense of country. To cross it means death." There was but one man who failed to cross it. I am not such a man; I will not buy my seat in Congress at the expense of honor or the sacrifice of principle.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that since this House by a vote of 300 to 1 decided to expunge the gentleman's remarks from the RECORD he has declared his intention of having additional copies printed for circulation?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell the gentleman from Ohio frankly, because I do not believe in any other way. That is one of my faults, I suppose; one of my greatest faults. But I come from west Texas, where men speak what they think. They do not camouflage it. They say exactly what is in their hearts. I want to tell the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that there is just one thing that keeps me from putting a copy of that RECORD into the hands of every male constituent of his district and into the hands of every male constituent of every Representative in the United States just as it is—reprint it: If I were able to I would take it to them in person. If I could not send it through the mails I would hand it to them, and I would say, "Here is an appeal from an American citizen to his Congressman for justice, and the Congressman tried to give it to him, and he was kicked out of Congress like a dog." I would send it to the male constituents of the Representative from Ohio, and I would not buy my seat; but I am not financially able. That is my only reason for not doing it.

When you kick me out, as I know you will, I will go home broke, but I am not broken in spirit. I have my self-respect. I will go back there and I will make a place for myself, and I will remove the humiliation you have put upon my dear wife and my dear children, who are just as dear to me as yours are to you. I will get my good name back some day, and I will show the people of the United States that I am entitled to it. There is nothing that I could say that would change your vote. Your minds are made up. If that New York Times article reported the truth, the Republican steering committee, through Mr. MONDELL, means to cut my head off politically through all time in the future.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. But the man who is not afraid to lose his own head does not consider his political head. Gentlemen, I thank you kindly. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Before I do that, I want to say that I had understood, Mr. Speaker, that at some time I would be recognized for an hour.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Tennessee has no objection, I should like to yield 10 minutes of my time at this time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is a painful task for me to speak on the subject now pending. My personal relations with the Member from Texas have been of a pleasant nature. While many of us here would not approve his bitter attacks upon Mr. Gompers and organized labor, he nevertheless represents a very considerable body of public opinion in that regard, and it is but natural that he should be heard here.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us first eliminate the immaterial in this controversy. I may say as one of those not having the honor to belong to the steering committee, but as one present at the gathering mentioned, that there was no mention of any desire to get rid of the gentleman from Texas; no mention of his eccentricities in regard to procedure which have been distressful to almost the unanimous sentiment of this House. There was one thing under consideration, and that was that he had caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD matter unparalleled in its vulgarity and indecency. It is not at all surprising that I have received a letter from the head of a boys' school asking me to discontinue sending copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to his organization. That article went out into the homes of the United States, before the womanhood and the childhood. Nothing more offensive to purity and cleanliness and decency could have been attempted. What is worse even than that is that the Member from Texas has spoken here for an hour and ten minutes, and not one word of regret, not one word looking to an apology, has he uttered. The most he said was that he would like to leave it to a committee. And when he was asked if he would now circulate this article, running over with its indecency, he says there is but one thing that prevents him from doing it, and that is a lack of funds.

I recognize that he has made an appeal to your sympathies. I recognize that many of you, with myself, sympathize with him in his present position. But what has come over the Member from Texas? Is this mental or moral obliquity or callousness, that he does not recognize the enormity of the offense? In the first place, it is breaking faith with the House. Permission was granted him to speak of improvements in the Public Printing Office.

Under this leave there has been sent throughout the country this material so contrary to the dignity of the House, so offensive in every way. I care not if a few of his friends may feel it to be perfectly proper. I can not square my opinions with theirs. My friends of this House, though I have made mistakes, I can not allow it to be left in my record in the passing years that I declined to vote for the expulsion of a man guilty of such an offense. Why, if he had swept the sewers and the slums, if he had walked along the roads where uncleanliness and vileness whisper, he could not have surpassed this article. Something has been said about western Texas, but I do not believe that they approve any such article as this. By no means. If so, there is room for education. If so, there is room for new and higher ideals.

And, my colleagues, we have all of us something at stake in this. It is often said that a certain measure of diminished attention has been given to the House of Representatives, that a certain discredit rests upon it. The place of a legislator is not altogether an ideal one. Mr. Macauley once said that a man who held a position in the House of Commons had a career which was characterized by hope without realization, labor without accomplishment, devotion to duty without reward. Whatever may be said of the attention paid to this House in the past and in the present, it is not now lacking in men who with a trumpet tone can utter sentiments of patriotism and of altruism, and who in their inmost thoughts are filled with devotion to country and to humankind. But can we expect that we will be respected by the country if we allow such material as this to go forth? Can we expect that the people will commend the action of Congress if such a thing as this is allowed?

Think of the days of Madison, that splendid patriotic spirit from Virginia; of Clay and of all that grand array from the beginning to the present. Think of such a thing as this having been tolerated in those days! Think of these RECORDS, containing anything of this kind, being placed beside Hansard's Parliamentary Debates of the English House of Commons, the report of the proceedings of the French Chamber of Deputies, or our own annals of Congress. I impress upon you that if we would gain the respect of the people we must first have regard to our own honor and to our own dignity and must exclude the slimy and the vile, and must exclude from this House those who are guilty of imposing it upon us.

The Member from Texas has gone far astray. Whatever his service may have been here, his action in this one regard eclipses and extinguishes all the rest, and places a blot upon his career; a blot not alone upon his career but a reproach to this House of Representatives, a reproach which this day must be removed and I trust will be removed irrespective of party by an overwhelming vote for his expulsion. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Ohio yields back two minutes. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire if it is now in order to offer a substitute? I do not care, of course, to press it to a decision at this time, but I do desire at the proper time to offer a substitute.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman has the right in his own time to offer a substitute. I desire to reserve all points of order on all substitutes that may be offered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understand that this is read for information?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennnessee. I offer it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas THOMAS L. BLANTON, a Representative in Congress from the State of Texas, did, on the 4th day of October, 1921, ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD "upon the improvements in the Government Printing Office," which consent was granted by the House; and

Whereas under the permission thus obtained the said THOMAS L. BLANTON did insert and cause to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, October 22, 1921, a certain letter or communication purporting to have been written by one Millard French to George H. Carter, Public Printer, which said communication contained language that was so indecent, obscene, vulgar, and vile as to render it unmailable had it been contained in any other than an official publication; and

Whereas the said THOMAS L. BLANTON by taking the responsibility of inserting such matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has offered an indignity to the House of which he is a Member and to the people represented by the membership of the Congress whose official organ the publication is, for which he deserves the severe rebuke and censure of the House: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said THOMAS L. BLANTON be, and he is hereby, voted the censure of this body, and the Speaker of the House is hereby directed to summon him to the bar of the House and deliver to him its reprimand and censure.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the substitute is not germane to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it agreeable to the gentleman to reserve the point of order and let the debate continue?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of all things which I desire, I think I desire most to be just to all my fellow men, and that without reference to their religious creed, their political beliefs, their race, their eccentricities, or their temperaments.

Since I learned a few moments before this resolution was presented by the gentleman from Wyoming that it was to be presented, it has been almost constantly in my thought during my waking hours. I realized that I was to be called upon to meet a situation which I had never confronted before. I have sought with all the diligence possible to prevent this matter from taking on the slightest appearance of being affected by political affiliations or divisions. In speaking now I speak only for myself; but from conversations had with many Members of the House upon both sides I do know that I voice the sentiment of many at least of them, although not speaking as their representative, that to impose the extreme penalty of expulsion upon the Member from Texas is a punishment that the offense does not merit.

In saying that, Mr. Speaker, I do not for one moment set down aught in extenuation of what the gentleman from Texas inserted in the RECORD. I make no effort to palliate or excuse. It is my judgment, deliberately formed, after earnest, and I hope conscientious study, that the offense does deserve severe rebuke and censure, and so this resolution which has been read at the desk has been presented and will, if the parliamentary situation shall permit, and I trust that it may permit, will be formally offered to the end that the judgment of this House may be expressed upon that question.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, I take the floor on this occasion with a feeling of deep regret that I am arising in opposition to the resolution offered by the majority leader, but I am obliged to do so by a conscientious distinction in my own mind in regard to the question of punishment. When yesterday morning I learned for the first time that a resolution of expulsion was to be presented to this House, I then read thoroughly and completely and thoughtfully the whole of the speech that was inserted by the gentleman from Texas in the RECORD. I want to give to the House an exact statement of the impression which the reading of this as a lawyer made upon my mind. * * *

This is a resolution of expulsion. Under the situation the House has a right to judge of the qualifications and to punish disorderly and improper conduct of its Members. The action in that respect is unlike an impeachment, which is simply to remove one from office; this is a question of punishment. I said to myself nothing can be expressed by me in condonation of the publication of this article. Gentlemen agree that it should not have gone into the RECORD, and I voted to expunge the whole speech from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. But to my mind, in reading it there occurred this differentiation on the question of punishment. If this article had been inserted for the purpose of disseminating something that was blasphemous and obscene, I would vote to expel and add to the force of the expulsion that which would make it felt.

When we take the gentleman himself as an exhibit, as he displayed himself here to-day—and every court in inflicting punishment judges a man and the act, justly and properly—when you regard this gentleman from Texas with his intensity, with his zeal that makes a bigot, that when enlisted in an attack on a cause makes him a partisan in the extreme, you must consider that in connection with what he was doing. He very justly said that intent after all is the vital thing in judging any offense which savors of criminality.

What was his intent in inserting this article in the RECORD? Was it to be blasphemous; was it to be obscene? Not a man in this House can honestly and truthfully say that that is true. It is not true. He was fighting an evil, an evil that he believed to exist honestly and fairly, and he was marshaling all the evidence that would prove that evil did exist, and among other things he inserted a sworn statement which had been sent to him as evidence of this state of affairs in a public office under this Government. The real obscenity, the real blasphemous words, occurred in the Government Printing Office, if the affidavit be true. This man was simply calling your attention, and my attention, and the attention of the Congress of the United States to the conduct of that Government office which he claimed deserved rebuke, censure, and perhaps punishment.

I hold no brief for the gentleman from Texas. I have scarcely exchanged words with him since he and I have been in this House. I am speaking only and solely from a sense of duty. There is a line of differentiation between that which has for its purpose the expression of blasphemy and obscenity and that which has for its purpose the correction of an evil.

This man wanted you to know the height and breadth and the depth and the ignominy of the conditions against which he was inveighing. I know not whether it be true or false, but he believed it, and he was simply marshaling the evidence which in his mind sustains the charges he was making against a system; a system which he has been fighting unremittingly ever since I have heard his voice on the floor of Congress.

I ask you gentlemen of the House to remember this, that while we are acting upon this resolution no personal feeling should be allowed to enter our thought or our judgment. If this man has been a source of annoyance until he has created an atmosphere of antagonism, you have no right to allow that to enter into your judgment of his case or into the degree of his punishment. You must not administer excessive punishment. In my humble judgment, and I speak for myself alone, expulsion is an excessive punishment and ought not to be administered at the hands of this House. Let him be censured; let him be censured at the bar of this House by the Speaker of the House, and made to feel that the act which he did was an erroneous and improper one; that he had no right to marshal this evidence and put it in the public RECORD where through our acts, not his, it is disseminated throughout the country. Distribution is our act and not his. He knew that it would be distributed, perhaps he thought of it and perhaps he did not, but there is only one thing upon which we can act and base our judgment, and that is, what was his motive? And I say to you that while the act itself is indefensible, the motive makes the punishment of expulsion indefensible. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with feelings of the utmost regret, more painful feelings than I have ever experienced in this body, or than I could ever apprehend to be among the experiences likely to befall me as a Member, that I find myself impelled, from regard for the House and its dignity, from regard for the safety of public morals and the credit of representative government, to support the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

I should gladly take refuge from this necessity—a necessity imposed upon me by my conscience and my sense of duty—in support of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the leader of my own side, but I must confess that after the action of Mr. BLANTON here to-day, censure of his conduct would reflect more upon the House than it could upon that Member. [Applause.]

Let us realize the actual condition in which we are placed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]—as I think does everybody in this House—agrees that the publication we are considering was a gross offense, not merely against parliamentary propriety but against all morals and against all law. It might have been that we could have extended leniency to him and considered the motive that governed him—which I am quite willing to concede was not a deliberate purpose to corrupt morals or pander to pruriency—had he not boldly assumed full responsibility for it now that he knows the effect it has produced. God knows I was ready, entering this House to-day, to extend to his conduct every presumption of good intent that could possibly govern a human action in itself reprehensible, if only the Member from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] had given me a chance to do it. But, Mr. Speaker, when that Member stood on this floor and stated deliberately that he did nothing for which he wished to offer an apology, but that he had done a thing which he would repeat if he had the financial ability to make the repetition effective, then all room or reason for speculation about his motive was swept away. Whatever he may have intended when he sent that obscene matter to be printed, however little he may have realized then the enormity of that act, there can be no doubt that he knows now the degree to which it may act as a force for the corruption of morals, and when he declares in the light of all that has been said on the subject his readiness to give those unspeakable obscenities wider circulation, then, Mr. Speaker, if we continue association with him and by allowing him to remain a Member of this House empower him to repeat the offense for which he refuses to apologize, we make ourselves responsible for any tide of depravity, however foul, that may flow in the future from the same source. I do not believe if we assume that attitude we can return to our constituencies with any right to claim that we have done our duty in guarding the honor of Congress and in saving American citizenship from the injury it must suffer through such degradation of its chief representative body.

Mr. Speaker, let us consider just what this offense is, and I make due allowance for the fact that the Member who committed it was encouraged to take liberties with this House by the practice which has grown up of allowing the "extension of remarks," which have never been "remarked" on this floor, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This experience shows conclusively and strikingly that such a system is not merely unwise in point of parliamentary methods, but, I think, it is a violation of morals. For instead of recording accurately it misrepresents continuously to the country the character of our proceedings here. It conveys every day to the people the assertion—as in this very case—that things have been said on this floor which have never been uttered, that repartees have been exchanged which never have been heard, that views have been expressed and allowed to go without challenge which if actually aired by anyone would have provoked immediate opposition and criticism. But all these circumstances might properly be considered in mitigating the moral turpitude of this act, provided its enormity were acknowledged even now by its author. We might properly take into account his personal characteristics—his fanaticism as the gentleman from Pennsylvania described it—in extenuation of this conduct, which all of us concede to be reprehensible, which most of us deem to be loathsome, if he had but apologized, or even had said that he would not repeat it. But in view of his own words here to-day, I ask, of what value could mere censure of this man be? He has said that what he has done he will repeat. Your censure would not change his judgment of its propriety. He would still, according to his own statement, be bound in conscience as a representative of the people to repeat it if occasion arose—and occasion for such a speech is almost certain to recur, and to recur frequently, and if this act of making the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a vehicle for publication and diffusion of stuff so unspeakably loathsome be dismissed with a mere expression of our opinion of its propriety, then the House gives him license to repeat it whenever his own notion of propriety may lead him to think such a course is advisable. Now, the crucial fact which we can not escape is that he can not possibly repeat this act—which we all agree is deplorably obscene—unless we give him the power to do it by allowing him to occupy a seat in this House. This is the position he has created for us to-day. We can not escape it. Either we must express toleration, which means approval of this thing, or we must condemn it by making its repetition impossible. There is but one way in which repetition can be made impossible, and that is by expulsion.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], brilliant lawyer that he is, objects to expulsion on the ground that it would be an excessive punishment, and he has discoursed learnedly and eloquently about sufficiency of punishment. There is no element of punishment here. There is no element of punishment in any proceeding which simply affects the holding of a public office, as I had occasion to point out to this House many years ago, when the question of impeaching Judge Swayne, of Florida, was pending.

Gentlemen were appealing then to many maxims and principles of the ordinary law, such as the presumption of innocence or the doctrine of reasonable doubt. I then pointed out that all of those principles and maxims and doctrines belonged to what is known as the common law. They do not affect the "law of Parliament," as was pointed out by Edmund Burke in his memorable report to the English House of Commons on the long delay of the proceedings in the impeachment of Warren Hastings. And the law of Parliament is also the law of Congress. When a man is brought before the House to answer for the administration of an office there is no presumption in his favor. He is in the position of a trustee called upon to account for his trust. If any presumption exists at all, it is that he is always held to the strictest responsibility for the exercise of a power placed in his hands not for his own benefit or glorification but for the welfare of the State—that is to say, of all the people. And when a Representative takes this floor he assumes a trust not alone to the people of the district that chose him but to the whole Nation, for which this body, representing the whole Nation, can always require him to account. When his remarks are inserted in the RECORD they are to be judged by their value to the body politic—by their effect upon the people of this country. There is no presumption in his favor. He has no right to the office except that which he holds from the Constitution, and when he forfeits that right by conduct which the Constitution and the laws declare to be infamous he can not be retained here without extending his infamy to this House that tolerates it. [Applause.]

Let us consider for one moment the character of the offense. He practically admitted its enormity, although quite unconsciously, when in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] he said that he would gladly put a copy of these obscenities in the hands of every male voter in Mr. LONGWORTH's district. Mr. Speaker, the male voter is only half the constituency now. Why would he not put it in the hands of the female voter? Because even his depraved sense of manhood recoiled from the thought of placing such filth under the eyes of pure American women. Oh, but he says he has taken the precaution to eliminate much of the language and to substitute for the worst expressions dashes or blanks between the first and the last letters of each word.

Mr. Speaker, I regard that as an aggravation of the offense. Certainly, it is an aggravation of the injury. I do not think that ever before was there placed in print anywhere, even in the worst specimens of pornographic literature which are prohibited by statute from circulation through the mails under severe penalties, anything so appallingly filthy, obscene, and impure as these words that are embraced in that speech. The effect of employing dashes between the first and last letters of the filthiest expressions instead of writing them out in full was to provoke additional curiosity. It was to lead many persons—women among them—to ask what those dashes meant. If they had been written in full, I do not believe that among a thousand men one could be found willing to continue reading them after their character had been indicated by the first of them. The inevitable result was to awaken in minds that had never heard of such bestialities curiosities that could not be satisfied without grave injury to morals. So inconceivably base are they that even seasoned sinners must have found in that publication suggestions of depravities that they had never before heard of.

That is the effect—the deplorable effect—of placing these obscenities in circulation. That a Government publication should have been made the agency to bring such horrible stuff under the eyes of women and children, of persons whose minds are just expanding into knowledge of life and its mysteries, awakening in them curiosities about depravities knowledge of which should be withheld from them as long as possible, is an outrage upon the people of this country so awful that nothing but the severest punishment of the person responsible for it—who refuses to apologize for it—can expiate. I thank God that three-quarters of the people who will read this stuff will not understand it. But for that reason they will ask explanations. And those explanations must spread knowledge of depravities in quarters where it may work demoralization that can not fail to be in the last degree deplorable. The very knowledge of such enormities is a dangerous thing. As the poet Pope has sung:

> Vice is a monster of such horrid mien,
> That to be hated needs but to be seen;
> But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I do not believe, thank God, that vice such as this publication describes would ever be embraced by many human beings. But the fact remains that the first step toward such deep demoralization is information of those infamies, and that first step has been taken by all those who have read the speech which the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has placed under their eyes.

What can this House do that is commensurate with this offense? It has been said, censure him. The offending Member has shown he cares nothing about censure; he invites expulsion. He is apparently possessed of the idea—God help us all if it be true—that there is somewhere or other in this country a constituency which would reelect him on the issue of his right to use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for dissemination of obscenity. I think he said with some degree of boastfulness that the people of Texas—at least in that part of Texas from which he comes—always say what is in their minds, leaving us to infer that the loathsome stuff for which he assumes responsibility is what they would express. Well, if that be so, the best thing that could happen for us, for that district, and the world would be for a plague of universal dumbness to fall upon its inhabitants.

If that is the kind of matter that a constituency anywhere in this country would tolerate and approve, it is well we should know it. It would be, indeed, deplorable if a constituency or a State should elect a man to high office on the issue of his right to distribute among women and children, through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, obscenities which I do not believe any considerable number of you would allow to be uttered in their presence. But while that would be deplorable, it would not be half so deplorable as if the House of Representatives deliberately tolerated such an outrage upon decency by failure to take the one and only effective way to prevent its recurrence. Remember, he has never said he will not repeat this act. He has protested he would. Your censure can not prevent recurrence of it. Expulsion can prevent it. And therefore expulsion becomes a duty you can not evade without becoming yourselves parties to the infamy. If we do less than this we will not have taken the only remedy that is effective. Failure to take the only remedy that is effective will be toleration of that which is disgraceful to ourselves, discreditable to the House, unspeakably debasing to morals, and immeasurably injurious to the credit and the welfare of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my conception of my duty on this occasion precludes me from following the example of the gentleman who preceded me, in approaching this problem as an advocate or as a prosecutor, but compels me to believe that it is the function of a Member of this House, faced with a question of expulsion, to act as a judge, and as a judge to shut his eyes to many of the considerations that have been brought to our attention. Justice is blindfold; justice requires that in the determination either of fact or of penalty there shall be no consideration of extraneous circumstances. It is true that with every other Member of this House I approach this case tempted by my recollection of the record of the Member from Texas to introduce that record into the reaching of a conclusion. I recall that in the Sixty-sixth Congress on 126 occasions he compelled a roll call, thus consuming more than 10 days of the time of the House, uselessly in my belief, so filching from me and every other Member 10 days of life. But he kept within the limits of the Constitution. I remember how time and again he has given us occasion for annoyance by his methods of obstructing the processes of legislation, but I must confess he usually has kept within the four corners of the rules of the House. This annoyance, too, must be shut out of our recollection. In the time allotted to him to-day he has given the appearance of inviting and inciting us to impose upon him the extreme penalty. In the face of what he has just said it is even more difficult than before calmly to reach an unprejudiced conclusion. Yet it is our duty wholly to exclude these things from our minds in determining what should herein be done, with the welfare of our institutions in mind. We are building day by day higher still the walls of the fortress of our liberties by adding block after block to the structure of parliamentary law. To-day we may place upon those walls another useful stone if we wisely decide our course in a matter virtually without precedent in the history of legislative assemblies on this side of the ocean.

I should but reiterate the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] if I cautioned you at any length as to the duty of making the penalty proportionate to the offense. Only three times in the history of this House has a Member been expelled, and in each of those cases it was on account of the treasonable condition of the Member concerned. Two of the men were in the field against the Union forces and the third at the head of a provisional government contemplating secession from the United States. Now, calmly, without prejudice, without passion, let us ask ourselves whether it is wise, whether it is right, to place this man's offense upon the level with treason. Like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], I have no word to say in palliation or extenuation. The offense smells to Heaven. In the nostrils of righteous-minded men it is a rank and hateful offense. But is this the penalty that should be imposed, the penalty of expulsion?

I doubt if even the attitude that should be taken toward expulsion has been better expressed than in the report of the Poland Committee on the Credit Mobilier scandal in 1873. It found the same purpose in impeachment and expulsion. It said:

> The great purpose of the power of impeachment is to remove an unfit and unworthy incumbent from office, and though a judgment of impeachment may to some extent operate as a punishment, that is not its principal object. Members of Congress are not subject to be impeached, but may be expelled, and the principal purpose of expulsion is not as punishment, but to remove a Member whose character and conduct show that he is an unfit man to participate in the deliberations and decisions of the body, and whose presence in it tends to bring the body into contempt and disgrace.

Mark you that phrase, "bring the body into contempt and disgrace." I realize that many gentlemen are anxious to vote in this matter solely according to what they believe to be the dictates of conscience. They say it is their duty to vote for what they believe to be right regardless of the result, but when you face the true meaning of expulsion you must realize that not only the character of the House is at stake but also the reputation of the House. We build our character.

The world builds our reputation. In the issue before us here both character and reputation are involved. That is why not only we have the right but also it is our obligation to consider what will be the effect of our course on the reputation of the House.

Let experience throw light thereon.

I told you this matter was without a precedent in our annals. But it is not without precedent in the history of parliamentary bodies, for a little more than 150 years ago in the English Parliament John Wilkes, under circumstances remarkably analogous to these, was confronted by expulsion. In 1763 for attacking the Government in that famous No. 45 of the North Briton, he had been sent to the Tower. Soon after his release he printed a little book containing a parody on Pope's Essay on Man, a paraphrase of the Veni Creator, and other poems. The Government learned of these and proceeded to use them as a weapon with which it was meant to crush Wilkes. In 1769 they were advanced as one of three reasons why he should be expelled from the House of Commons. In the Essay on Woman he had written, or at any rate printed, what according to contemporary judgment was the most indecent and blasphemous poem that had ever been composed. What followed? When the people came to build the reputation of John Wilkes they ignored his obscenity and his blasphemy. They fixed their eyes on what John Wilkes had done for them and, whether mistaken or not, whether right or wrong, they based judgment on that alone, and they made him for a time the most popular man in England. Who to-day will say they erred? Who will say the House of Commons did not err?

The Member from Texas was, of course, wholly wrong in saying there is no appeal from the decision of this tribunal. There is an appeal to the people, and who can doubt that if he is expelled it will be made? Not alone to the people of his district and his State, but to the people of all the land will that appeal be made. Therefore, we may well observe and well profit by what happened when John Wilkes appealed to the people of England after an expulsion from Parliament based in part upon obscenity and blasphemy.

The people showered him with gifts and honors. They reelected him to Parliament. He was rejected. Again and again he was reelected, only to be again and again rejected. At last he was perforce accepted by the House of Commons, and a dozen years or so later that same body expunged from its rolls the stain upon his record.

Mark you what may be done in the present instance. The Member from Texas may go forth and say "These were not my words; these were the words of a Government employee, and words that I believed ought to be called to the attention of the people. My purpose was honorable and high." That may or may not be false. Who shall search the heart and determine? God alone is the searcher of hearts. False or true, it will be said, and false or true the people of the land in building our reputation, in deciding whether they shall place greater or less faith in the Congress of the United States, whether they shall have more or less confidence in their representation under this dome—the people of the United States, as sure as the sun is in the sky, will say we did not expel this man for the reason that might well animate every Representative here; that we did not expel him because we believed him an unfit Member, but that we expelled him for reasons not to the credit of the House. You and I know how this will be exploited. Of all times in our lives was there ever a more inopportune moment to permit the inference to be drawn that in our attitude on this case we saw fit to pass judgment on the problems of organized labor?

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield to a question there?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman agrees the matter that was circulated should not have been circulated?

Mr. LUCE. Absolutely.

Mr. FESS. And also the gentleman agrees that in the degree that we can go we ought to prevent it in the future?

Mr. LUCE. Absolutely.

Mr. FESS. What assurance has the House under the statement of the gentleman from Texas in his defense that the thing will not be repeated whenever the opportunity arises, unless we take this action?

Mr. LUCE. We have no assurance whatever. If he again knocks at our doors, as did John Wilkes, we shall either admit or reject him. Sooner or later, if he persists, as did John Wilkes, we will admit him, and then we will be at his mercy, just as we are at this moment at the mercy of each other. Our only final recourse is the power of public opinion.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. LUCE. I will.

Mr. FESS. I came into the room with the same feeling that the gentleman is expressing now on the floor. Until I heard the statement of the gentleman from Texas I was inclined to resist the vote of expulsion. But the gentleman from Texas has put me in an attitude where it is either a vote of expulsion or else I am excusing what he did and giving him the opportunity to continue it in the future. That is the position I am in, and I think my duty to public decency is to say, so far as I can, that this thing should not be repeated with our approval. It strikes me that it will be an approval if we do not take this drastic attitude.

Mr. LUCE. I have been embarrassed in that particular precisely like the gentleman from Ohio. The words of the Member from Texas have made it yet more difficult for me to do what I conceive to be my duty. But I am not voting only for to-day; I am voting for to-morrow as well. A seemingly righteous precedent set now may be turned to unrighteous ends next year. There is no legislator in the United States who may not be put in danger of his political life if it is once embedded in the parliamentary law of the land that men may be expelled from lawmaking bodies for such reason. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the resolution presented by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] brings the Member from Texas before the bar of this House for an alleged offense against the dignity of the House, contrary to its rules, and against good morals and decency. The action and statements of the Member from Texas to-day bring the House of Representatives before the bar of public opinion of the United States of America. A government can not punish itself. The legislative branch of this Government can only purge itself if within its membership there be found one or more who have violated the rules of the House or committed an offense which, had it been done in his individual capacity, would, under the laws that we have made, representing the people of the country, have made him subject to severe punishment.

I recall the words of the gentleman who preceded me, my colleague, Mr. LUCE, to the effect that we might misjudge the motives of the Member from Texas, and therefore we should or ought to hesitate, yea, to fear to do our duty in the premises. Mr. Speaker, the Member from Texas caused to be inserted in the official RECORD of the proceedings of this Congress language unfit for repetition upon this floor, language not used in conversation between men of normal minds and good character. He has said here to-day that he would cause that to be circulated were it not for the expense.

I say that his action here to-day has brought us before the bar of the opinion of the good and decent manhood and womanhood of America to answer the question, whether we desire, when one of our Members has committed that action and has gone to that extent, to say to the country at large that we take our duties only so seriously that we prize the position that we hold only to that extent that, having offered to repeat that offense, we will bring him before the bar of the House and say, "You should not have done it, but you may continue here your membership."

Ah, no, Mr. Speaker; even though this establishes a precedent, the seriousness of this offense warrants us in establishing that precedent and saying to the country that our aspirations here are to keep this body clean and pure; that we will not permit to be sent forth through the mails and put into the official RECORD language that is not only an insult to ourselves but to the people who make up this great Government. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not support the resolution offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and in order that I may not be misunderstood, I have sought this opportunity of expressing myself.

I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and with his resolution that the punishment proposed in the resolution of the gentleman from Wyoming is probably itself too severe for the crime committed. But when I say that, I do not intend to be understood to condone anything that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has done.

I agree with the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee that the language which he inserted in the RECORD is indecent, is vile, is vulgar, and is unspeakable. Even though my colleague from Texas seeks to be the leader in a great cause, the matter that he inserted in the RECORD and the reflection that he made upon the membership of this House are a very high price, indeed, to pay for cheap notoriety as the leader of any cause. I believe that the English language can not be too strong in the drawing of a resolution of censure of my colleague from Texas for this breach of the privileges and the confidence of the Membership of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas yields back one minute.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] use some of his time?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall use even the whole of the five minutes' time that has been yielded to me, because this is a question upon which I have found so little difficulty in making up my mind that it will take but a very brief time to state my reasons for my vote upon the pending propositions. From the very outset it has been very clear to me that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] violated the rules of the House when he inserted the objectionable affidavit. Therefore on last Monday I voted without a moment's hesitation to strike his extension of remarks from the permanent CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I think a resolution of censure for his insertion of such objectionable matter would be entirely proper. But I think a resolution of expulsion is entirely too severe a punishment for the offense, and I will not vote for it. Therefore I shall support the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], if it is held in order. If that resolution should be held out of order or if its adoption should fail by a vote of the House, then I shall not hesitate to vigorously oppose the resolution of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Since I have been a Member of this House I have not sought to make a reputation as a speaker or an orator. I have not sought to impress the House with any pretense of being a parliamentary expert or as having any profound knowledge of statecraft, but I have tried to impress my fellow Members by my speeches and votes that I have a sense of fairness and justice. Whether I have succeeded in so impressing the House is not for me to say. But whatever sense of justice I do have leads me to believe that the ends of justice would be entirely served by the passage of a resolution of censure. There are many reasons which I could state as to why I believe such method of punishment would be entirely adequate, but lack of time, of course, forbids that I go into these reasons at any length. I will state, however, that expulsion from the House is capital punishment, so far as legislative procedure is concerned, and should be resorted to only in the most extreme and aggravated cases. I do not regard this as such a case.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK. No; because I have only five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLACK. Now, the gentleman from New York, the eloquent Mr. COCKRAN, says this is not a question of punishment, and therefore the question of gradations in punishment has no place in a case of this sort. That is rather a strong statement to be made by one of such wide learning and legislative experience as the gentleman from New York.

He surely forgets for the moment that the very constitutional provision under which we are proceeding—section 5, Article I, of the Constitution says that—

Each House may punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a Member.

It is that very provision which enables the House to act at all in a case of this kind. Without such authority we would have no power to punish a Member at all. Right underneath the provision of the Constitution which I have just quoted in the House Manual and Digest is this statement:

The two methods of punishment are censure and expulsion.

So the gentleman from New York was very wide of the mark when he said that in dealing with a case of this kind we should not consider the gradations of punishment.

And while I am at this point discussing for the moment the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], I want to take the opportunity to call attention to one unfair statement which he made, whether intentionally or inadvertently, I do not know. He said that Mr. BLANTON, in his argument before the House, said that he represented a district in west Texas where the people spoke out openly and freely.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me two minutes more?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. BLACK. And that Mr. BLANTON had sought to leave the impression with the House that these people would freely approve the use of language such as was in the affidavit. Now, all who heard Mr. BLANTON'S statement know that no remarks that he made could be construed to that effect, nor did he seek to leave any such impression. What he did say, in substance, was: "That his people, understanding the circumstances under which such language was inserted, would not condemn him for it." Whether they would or would not, is not for me to say. But in arguing this question let us be fair to him and not put into his speech an impression which he did not intend to convey. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is usually a very fair man, a man of good temper, and yet he took the RECORD and sought to make the House believe that Mr. BLANTON'S extension of remarks was so written that it was intended to make the people believe that it was a speech which he had delivered on the floor of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In just a moment, then I will. Now, the extension of Mr. BLANTON'S remarks is headed at the outset—

Extension of remarks of Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON—just as we all head our extensions of remarks when we make them. Then the gentleman from Wyoming complains that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] throughout the extension of his remarks says, "Mr. Speaker," Mr. Speaker this, and Mr. Speaker that. I submit to every fair-minded man in the House that it is the universal custom of Members to use the expression "Mr. Speaker" in their extension of remarks. Some use the expression more than others, but that it is the universal practice of Members I believe no one will dispute. Therefore I think that the gentleman from Wyoming might well, indeed, have omitted that statement from his speech. Now I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how the time is?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has 20 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wyoming 15.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in case it is held in order. I desire to accompany the statement of that conclusion with a few words respecting this case. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in making his remarks before the House this morning quoted some newspaper report as having said that Members of the Texas delegation were meeting or caucusing with respect to this case and that political considerations were said to be of influence among that membership. I desire to say for myself and for all members of the Texas delegation with whom I have had the opportunity to consult after that statement was made that the delegation has at no time had any meeting, has at no time had any caucus, has at no time pursued any concerted action with reference to this particular case. Nor have the members of that delegation, either individually or collectively, so far as I am able to ascertain, been influenced, nor will they be influenced in casting their votes, by any political or extraneous consideration, and that the only possible motive which may influence them other than the dictates of their consciences may be impulses of leniency and consideration. The Members of this House, I believe, will bear witness that the Texas delegation is a fair average of the delegations that sit in this body. [Applause.] And I want to disabuse the mind of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the minds of those who have heard him, of the idea that there has been at any time any effort whatever to let political considerations govern our action in this regard. So far as I know, the delegation, not collectively but in their individual capacities, will vote largely against the resolution of expulsion and in favor of the substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was absent a few days ago when the resolution of expulsion was introduced. I myself sought to get in communication with him and his office in order to advise him of these proceedings, with no purpose other than a simple desire that any man might have an opportunity to know of a transaction of this kind that had taken place in his absence, and especially a Member from my State. Later I felt an impulse to go to him and say something to him about it; but it is perhaps fortunate that I did not, because I heard him on this floor this morning make the statement that some who had come to him and counseled with him and advised him pretended to be his friends but were not in fact his friends; and a fear that I might be likewise misunderstood influenced me in not making advances to him in that regard.

I shall not be influenced by any personal consideration whatever. I want to say, gentlemen of the House, that expulsion from this body is a severe punishment for any offense. I can not condone or excuse the language contained in the extension of remarks of the gentleman [Mr. BLANTON], whether his own language or whether that of another, placed in the RECORD under the sanction of his approval. I can not believe that that language is fit for any publication. It is not fit to be uttered on the floor of this chamber or upon the floor of any other chamber, but as a Member of this House I can not vote to expel him from this body for that conduct. We must remember, as was so well expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], that in inflicting punishment for an offense the intent, motives, and feelings of the person who is charged with the offense must be taken into consideration, and I believe that those who witnessed the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] here this morning have come to believe that he did not regard the use of this language as being offensive to the degree that other gentlemen on this floor regard it as offensive.

And so, gentlemen of the House, I am going to appeal to this membership not to expel the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. If you see fit, adopt a resolution of censure and let it remain here on the records of this House as a punishment for his offense in placing matters so vile and filthy in the records of this House. We must remember that perhaps he has become so obsessed with following some purpose in which he has enlisted that he does not see clearly many things that transpire, that he is so intent on pursuing this particular purpose that he has failed to appreciate the gravity of the offensiveness of the language and has failed to appreciate the depths of shame which such language ought necessarily to bring to anyone who contemplates its character.

And so, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, representing no one except myself, but speaking what I believe to be the sentiment of every Member from Texas other than the gentleman now before the bar of this House, I want to repudiate utterly the idea that any motive shall find consideration within our breasts except even and exact fairness, tempered with consideration for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. And I ask the membership of this House not to expel him, but to adopt a censure which shall express the regret and the reprobation of this House for the course of action which he, in his misdirected effort, and perhaps his unconsciousness of its gravity, has seen fit to inflict upon the dignity and the privileges of this body. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I would rather not yield at present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two and a half minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH].

Mr. WURZBACH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to say that I am fully conscious of the solemnity of this occasion. When I came this morning I had fully intended not to participate, even in the vote upon this resolution. I certainly did not intend to speak upon it. Since hearing the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], in his own defense, I can not do otherwise than to vote in favor of the resolution presented by the gentleman from Wyoming. Mr. BLANTON, instead of showing a contrite spirit, publicly defied the House. I can not understand how any man who considers the traditions of this House could assume such an attitude after cool deliberation, and neither can I understand how, in the face of the defiant declaration of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], that he would at any future time he chose repeat this language—how any man in the face of that situation can vote to keep him here, or permit him to remain a Member of this House. I have risen for the principal purpose of resenting the imputations that have been made on this floor in the discussion of this resolution against the good people of my State, the State of Texas, the men, women, and children of my State, especially the imputation that the people of my State would indorse the use of words that were inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WURZBACH. No; I have only a short time. I make that statement for the reason that the gentleman from Texas has stated that he would not apologize, that he had a right to use that kind of language; in other words, that at a future time he would insert the same or similar language, in the RECORD. I want to say that if that is the standard that this House is going to establish, I am going to withdraw my application for RECORDS and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be made a sealed record and not for general distribution. I am not going to send copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to the women of my district if such matter is to blot and pollute its pages, and I have on my mailing list 25 or 30 women. I want to give notice here and now that if the resolution does not pass—for I could construe such action only as meaning that the gentleman from Texas, or any other Member of the House, can insert in the RECORD that kind or similar language—then I am not going to subject the women of my district who are receiving these copies to the shame and humiliation of having to read that language in any other copy that might go to them. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I feel a sense of great embarrassment in taking the position that I do, because I have confidence in the leadership of the gentleman from Wyoming, and realize that his jealous care of the reputation and dignity of this House had led him to introduce this resolution. I also like to follow the leadership of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], for there is no man in this House actuated by higher principles and higher motives and more generous impulses than that gentleman in his treatment of fellow Members. Mr. Speaker, I am more embarrassed because every single thing they have said is absolutely true, and it is hard to find any answer or argument to refute their accusations, if one desired to do so. But, sir, this is not a partisan question, and I know that these two gentlemen and other Members of the House would not wish any Member, no matter which side of the House he sits upon, to subject his own ideas or beliefs to their wishes or their opinions. I look at the defense that the gentleman from Texas made on the floor of this House from a different standpoint than that of the gentleman from New York or the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WURZBACH], who preceded me.

If the gentleman from Texas had apologized to the House—and here I know that I will offend the sensibilities of some Members—had he apologized to the House, I would have cried "thumbs down," and voted for the resolution. For it would have been a confession of guilt. But the gentleman stated all that was dear to him, his reputation, his membership in this House, his future political activities, could not be bartered in exchange for a principle, and he stood upon that principle. It may not have been a right principle; it may have been a wrong principle; but the very fact that he did not apologize is sufficient to my mind to prove that he was sincere, and that his motive was to correct, as far as he could, an existing evil in the public Printing Office.

There is another consideration that weighs with me that has hardly been touched upon by any Member of the House, and perhaps it is irrelevant, but I have witnessed a similar session to this in another legislative body, and although you may intend to punish this man by expulsion from the House, in the minds and hearts of many of the people in this country you will make him a martyr and a hero. On the other hand, you may break the heart of a good, honest, beautiful woman, a woman of high character. You place a stigma on five children of this man that they will have to carry through their lives. I do not plead for mercy for him, because he has shown no mercy to us, but I do plead for his unoffending family. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for this resolution of expulsion for precisely the same reasons that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has given for his opposition to it. I received my early education in the great State of Massachusetts, but, thank goodness, I did not there imbibe the ideals which seem to animate the gentlemen from Massachusetts who have spoken to-day.

I am profoundly impressed on this occasion with the solemnity of the duty I feel called upon to perform to vote as I shall vote to expell from this body a man with whom I have for many years enjoyed friendly relations, and some of whose qualities I have heretofore held to be distinctly admirable.

In any case like this I would disassociate myself from any feeling of personal like or dislike and would similarly vote, whether the man concerned was my closest friend or my dearest foe, had he committed the unspeakable offense of which THOMAS L. BLANTON has been guilty. No resolution of censure, this or any other, no matter what its terms, can fully reach this case. This foul child of BLANTON'S creation has been deliberately dispatched to the four corners of the country, and is even now spreading its vile and corrupting influence among the youth of the Nation. Can we salve our consciences, can we feel that we have done our full duty by merely expressing our disapproval of this atrocity and leaving its perpetrator in a position where he can repeat the offense? For, mind you, gentlemen, no man who is not a Member either of this or the body at the other end of the Capitol could dispatch this vile thing through the mails without being arrested and punished as a felon.

Can a man who has thus deliberately, wantonly, and obscenely violated the confidence of his colleagues, violated the code which has for centuries in every country governed the conduct of honorable men—can such a man be trusted not again to offend when permitted to remain in a position immune from any pains and penalties resultant from such action?

My feeling might be different had Mr. BLANTON either before or after the introduction of his resolution expressed contrition or regret for his inexcusable conduct, but on the contrary he has brazenly and blatantly defended it. Only this morning, far from making apology, he announced in this presence that if he had the requisite funds he would see to it that this atrocious libel upon the honor of this House should be placed in the hands of every man in this country. And does anyone seriously contend that if this should go into the hands of every man in the country it would not also be in the hands of practically every woman and every boy and every girl in the Nation?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Can I have one minute more?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am not voting to punish Mr. BLANTON. His own conscience, if it shall awaken to the contempt and loathing in which his action is held by his colleagues, should be punishment enough. Nor am I concerned with his future; whether the most improbable result of his unseating would "martyrize" him and lead to his further political advancement matters not to me. What I am concerned with is the honor of this House, the preservation of its traditions and the correct and decent recording of its proceedings. I want to maintain the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a document of real use to the people of the United States. I want to maintain it as a document that will be a source of benefit to the pure and virtuous, not a source of delight to the degenerate and vile. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose anyone in the House has any thought, intention, or purpose of condoning or palliating or excusing the offense, yet I think we should approach this matter judicially, as though we were sitting on the bench, because we are dealing with a very important matter. Let us remember that this action does not embrace any element of a criminal character.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question.

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. HILL. There is the criminal code of the United States which I hold in my hand——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield. The circulation of this through the mail was not Mr. BLANTON'S personal act. What I want to get before the House is this, that it has not about it any element of official corruption. If there were the element of official corruption in the matter, expulsion would be the proper remedy, but this is an indiscretion; it is an exhibition of a lack of sensitiveness; it is a manifestation of a crude, a rough element of character that does not appreciate the finer sentiments and thoughts of life; but it has not within it any element of official corruption, and I think that the punishment should be censure and reprimand and not that which would be meted out to official corruption. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, there is no complication about this matter. In the first place, if the Member from Texas had meant right he could have inserted in the RECORD all of his speech save and except that portion which has been so ably described by Mr. MONDELL and Mr. COCKRAN, and simply said that there was language too obscene for publication, and given all of the meaning and all of the information to any people who wanted it; but he prefers to take the vile course of putting into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD obscene matter, unfit for publication or mailing to any constituency, and everyone here knows that. What are we mincing around about? He says to-day that he would not only violate the law but that if he had the money he would violate the postal law and have a reprint of that thing and put it into every home in this country. Oh, where is your southern chivalry? Does it not apply where one of you is concerned? I have heard through all of my life that you would go through fire to protect womanhood, and yet to-day you stand here and talk about censuring a man that caused that vile thing to go into our home and our mother's home and our daughter's home—and he brazenly said that had he the funds he would publish it and put it into every home. I had hoped that your standard of southern chivalry would be exemplified by your votes to uphold the honor and dignity of this House. Censure! Let him stand up here and have the Speaker talk to him and say that he should not have done this, when he says that he is proud to have done it and has not apologized and that he would do it again. Why, you would better tell the Speaker to go over to the House Office Building and administer that censure to that alligator in the little pool there, where there will be just as much of a reaction as there would be from any censure you could administer, if you adopt that fool substitute for this resolution. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the summing up of this case might be stated in this manner: The Member from Texas has printed in the RECORD an affidavit which speaks the truth concerning an occurrence in the Government Printing Office. The truth of the matter contained in the affidavit has not been challenged by anyone. We must therefore assume the accuracy of the same. In the next place it has not been charged that the matter printed was inserted in the RECORD and circulated for a vicious or unlawful purpose. On the contrary, it can hardly be denied that Mr. BLANTON believed he was performing a public service. Now, gentlemen, under these circumstances and this statement of the case I can not vote to expel any man from this House. In the third place, you should consider the temperament of the Member as well as the course he has pursued since he has been a Member of this House. The Member from Texas is a very intense character. Time and again I have wondered what motive prompted him to take the peculiar positions he has taken from time to time here. To be perfectly frank, in my judgment he is a crank [applause], and if I am correct that ought to be taken into consideration when you propose to expel any man. In the face of provocation he becomes positively fanatical. I do not believe there is another one of the 435 Members of this House who would be expelled upon the statement of the case made out against this man—not one. In the next place, it has been urged that there is danger of his repeating the offense. Why, that is begging the question. Of course, we can amend the rules in one day's time so that the offense can not be successfully repeated.

Now, gentlemen, make no mistake; you are dealing with a dangerous situation. You are proposing to inflict the extreme penalty—expel this man from this representative body because he has inserted in the RECORD, not his own words but an affidavit setting forth what occurred in the Government Printing Office. No one can defend or excuse the printing of obscene matter for a vicious purpose, but I venture the assertion there is not one Member who believes BLANTON had any such purpose in mind. Now, let me suggest this also. You Republicans have been largely responsible for making this man what he is. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Yes, indeed; you have. Your leaders have used him whenever it was to your interests to use him. There is not a man of you who can truthfully deny it. Now, he has committed this offense and you would kick him out of the House. He is a peculiar character, but he is not the man to attempt to corrupt the morals of the Nation by sending out dirty or obscene literature. All these things should be most carefully weighed before any man is expelled in disgrace. Visit the extreme penalty upon this man if you will, but when you expel him for telling the truth about an occurrence in a public institution, you may raise an issue and set a precedent which will rise up to plague you hereafter.

BLANTON made a mistake in the method he used to get the case of the printers who besought his help before the people of the Nation. He could easily have avoided using letters which suggest obscene words, but he has not falsified any record. Let us all remember this in passing upon the action of this most energetic but peculiar man.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we hail that issue. [Applause of the Republican side.] The issue of decency, the issue of honor as against filth, slime, and obscenity. If that is the issue, we welcome it. We stand here in defense of American manhood and womanhood, in defense of the honor and dignity of this House. No motive, no matter what it may be, justifies atrocious crime. No motive that can be suggested justifies the placing in the RECORD of the vile document this man put in the RECORD and sent to the ends of the earth. Having done this he stands here defiantly challenging us to put him out, and in effect declaring that if he remains he would repeat the act if he found the opportunity. There is but one thing possible in the face of acts and an attitude like this, and that is to purge the House of a man who does those things and holds these views.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there is a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has offered an amendment, to which the gentleman from Wyoming reserved the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I now make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I inquire what the point of order is?

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment is not germane to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Wyoming has interposed a point of order, thus using a parliamentary movement—he is clearly within his rights; I do not intend to criticize, but merely express regret—thus utilizing a parliamentary device which may probably prevent many in this House from expressing themselves as they would like to do upon this proposition which is before the House. There is no question, Mr. Speaker, so far as I have been able to find, in point upon this matter. There may be one or more, but I have not been able to find them. All that I can suggest is that the amendment is in the nature of a limitation. The House provides two methods of punishment—that is to say, the Constitution provides two methods of punishment—censure or expulsion.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Can there be any amendment to such a finality as expulsion? Can there be two degrees of expulsion, partial expulsion or a modification or an amendment in any way affecting the finality of expulsion?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; I said it was a limit upon the punishment. I did not say it was a limit upon expulsion.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The only issue is, Shall he stay in or go out? There can be no half way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is no quarrel between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard for a moment. I do not pose in any sense as an expert on parliamentary law, but, as the gentleman from Tennessee said, the Constitution itself provides two methods of punishment, namely, censure or, upon a vote of two-thirds, expulsion. Now, if the Speaker should hold that the substitute motion offered by the gentleman from Tennessee providing for a punishment of censure would not be a germane amendment, then the House would have no opportunity of voting upon the two methods of punishment provided in the Constitution, but would be limited to one, to wit, expulsion. Where there are two punishments provided by law for an offense, one a greater and the other a lesser punishment, it is always the duty of the court to submit to the jury both methods, so they may take both into consideration in settling the penalty. Therefore I submit that inasmuch as the real question now before the House is one as to punishment for an offense against the rules of the House, that the amendment providing for censure, which is one of the constitutional methods of punishment, would be a germane amendment and in order. It would, it seems to me, be going very far afield to hold a resolution of expulsion was unamendable by submitting a resolution calling for a milder punishment. I hope the Speaker will not establish that sort of a precedent in the ruling which he is about to make.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 5923, fifth volume of Hinds' Precedents, which reads:

On April 12, 1864, the House was considering a resolution for the expulsion——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is familiar with that case.

Mr. LUCE. The Chair is familiar with that case. Does the Chair desire to hear any argument in support of the position thus taken?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear argument, but he does not care to hear about that case.

Mr. LUCE. It seems to me the decision of the Chair in the case in question was amply justified, or otherwise we would be embarrassed in determining the measure of penalty to be imposed for an offense. Although the constitutional provision covers two phases of the subject, they are evidently closely related. An expulsion may be in part a punishment, it is generally held. The motion to amend brings before us in orderly manner the question of what degree of punishment may be imposed by the House. For that reason it has seemed to me the position then taken by the Chair was wise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair has given considerable attention to this point of order. It seems to the Chair very clear. It does not seem that a motion of censure, if this were a new question, would be germane to a motion to expel. The two are very different intrinsically. Then, the motion to expel requires a two-thirds majority; a motion to censure requires simply a majority. Suppose the amendment was adopted and the motion to expel was amended by a motion to censure; would that still be a motion to expel amended and require a two-thirds vote for its adoption or would it be a motion to censure? But probably that is not final, because it might be interpreted as a substitute. The decision which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] cited from Hinds' Precedents appears to be strictly on the point, but the Chair examined it in the RECORD, and he finds in the decision of the Chair that this point was not at all alluded to. It went over for two days, and when the decision was made this point of order was not even referred to. And the Chair does not think, consequently, that that is a precedent. There is a precedent, although the Chair does not think this either is final, in which Speaker Henderson said in the Roberts case:

Does anyone contend that changing a resolution from a condition where a mere majority can carry it through to a resolution which will require a two-thirds vote to carry it through—that such an amendment is germane to the original proposition?

The Chair does not entertain a single doubt but that this is not germane to the original resolution.

Of course, that case was different from this, and therefore the Chair does not think it is a direct precedent. But it seems to the Chair that in the nature of things, and looking at it as a new question, a motion to censure is not germane to a case to expel. And the Chair is confirmed by the conditions that exist on this resolution. Both motions are privileged, and therefore if the motion to expel should not prevail the motion to censure would still be in order, and therefore the remedy would still exist. And as to the objections made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that this motion is necessary in order that the House may express itself, it must be remembered that men who are opposed to doing anything might well vote, and often do vote, for a milder amendment, and if they carry that then vote against the whole proposition. So it would not follow on this amendment that a man who voted for the amendment would necessarily, if that amendment carried, vote for the resolution as amended. So the vote on the amendment would not really produce the result which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] referred to, of allowing the House to express its judgment. The Chair thinks that, inasmuch as both motions are privileged, the House will have the right to express itself if two-thirds do not vote for a motion to expel. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order to give notice that if the motion to expel fails a motion to censure will be offered?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman apparently has given that notice. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] demands the yeas and nays on the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 204, nays 113, answered "present" 1, not voting 113, as follows:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas THOMAS L. BLANTON, a Representative in Congress from the State of Texas, did, on the 4th day of October, 1921, ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD "upon the improvements in the Government Printing Office," which consent was granted by the House; and

Whereas under the permission thus obtained the said THOMAS L. BLANTON did insert and cause to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, October 22, 1921, a certain letter or communication purporting to have been written by one Millard French to George H. Carter, Public Printer, which said communication contained language that was so indecent, obscene, vulgar, and vile as to render it unmailable had it been contained in any other than an official publication; and

Whereas the said THOMAS L. BLANTON by taking the responsibility of inserting such matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has offered an indignity to the House of which he is a Member and to the people represented by the membership of the Congress whose official organ the publication is, for which he deserves the severe rebuke and censure of the House: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the said THOMAS L. BLANTON be, and he is hereby, voted the censure of this body, and the Speaker of the House is hereby directed to summon him to the bar of the House and deliver to him its reprimand and censure.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this is the resolution, word for word, which was read in the hearing of the House to-day, when the order was a little better than it was during the time it has just been read. It was stated then that it would, if the parliamentary situation permitted, be offered as a substitute resolution. The parliamentary situation did not admit of it. The situation has now arrived in which it is possible to offer it, and I do offer it, and upon it I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 293, nays 0, answered "present" 26, not voting 112, as follows:

Mr. COCKRAN. To the extension of the remarks.

The SPEAKER. By the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]?

Mr. COCKRAN. By anybody, after our experience which we have been considering to-day.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman is too late.

Mr. COCKRAN. If I am belated, I will withdraw it. I just wanted to express my feeling in regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks other business ought to be delayed until the matter before the House is disposed of.

CENSURE.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant at Arms will bring Mr. BLANTON to the bar of the House.

The Sergeant at Arms appeared at the bar of the House with Mr. BLANTON.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BLANTON, by a unanimous vote of the House—yeas, 293; nays, none—I have been directed to censure you because, when you had been allowed by the courtesy of the House to print a speech which you did not deliver, you inserted in it foul and obscene matter, which you knew you could not have spoken on this floor; and that disgusting matter, which could not have been circulated through the mails in any other publication without violating the law, was transmitted as part of the proceedings of this House to thousands of homes and libraries throughout the country, to be read by men and women, and, worst of all, by children, whose prurient curiosity it would excite and corrupt. In accordance with the instructions of the House and as its representative, I pronounce upon you its censure.

COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Public Lands I desire to present a privileged report from that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND] presents a privileged report from the Committee on the Public Lands, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8842) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska, having considered the same, report it back without amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I reserve points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves points of order on the bill.

ROADS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, offers the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 1072) be, and they are hereby, given specific authority, as provided by clause 2 of Rule XX, to agree to an amendment of the Senate providing for an appropriation."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House the conferees can not agree to a Senate amendment to a House bill providing for an appropriation, the bill not having originated in the House Committee on Appropriations or reported by that committee. This is the road bill. The Senate so amended it that it carries an appropriation. This is to authorize the conferees on the part of the House to agree with the Senate conferees on an appropriation, so that the bill may be disposed of and handled in the House as the House sees fit. It is provided for under the rule. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is liable to be away over Sunday, and he designates the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to preside.

ANNIE T. NEAL.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 199.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Annie T. Neal, widow of Henry Neal, late messenger to the Speaker, a sum equal to six months' salary as messenger to the Speaker, and that the Clerk be further directed to pay out of the contingent fund the expenses of the last illness and funeral of said Henry Neal, such expenses not to exceed $250.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution for the widow of a deceased employee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CHESTER W. TAYLOR AND M. J. TAYLOR.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 194.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Chester W. Taylor the sum of $228.33 and to M. J. Taylor the sum of $78.33, being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Hon. SAMUEL M. TAYLOR at the time of his death, September 13, 1921.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ROSE V. ELLIOTT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 197.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Rose V. Elliott, wife of Alex Elliott, late a House police of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the expenses of the funeral of said Alex Elliott.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MARY E. TAYLOR.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 208.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Mary E. Taylor, widow of John T. Taylor, late messenger on the soldiers' roll, a sum equal to six months' salary as messenger on the soldiers' roll, and that the Clerk be further directed to pay out of the contingent fund the expenses of the last illness and funeral of said John T. Taylor, such expenses not to exceed $250.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZATION.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 11.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the special committee appointed in accordance with the provisions of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved May 18, 1920, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit at any time, in the District of Columbia, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to employ a stenographer, at a cost per printed page as fixed by law, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may come before said committee, to print such hearings and other matter as may be necessary, and to employ such clerical services as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the act. All expenses in pursuance hereof shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, in equal proportions, upon vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof.

Passed the Senate August 22 (calendar day, August 23), 1921.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman from Illinois considered the propriety of placing a limitation on the amounts of expenditures to be made by this commission, as is customary in such resolutions?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that it is not customary in all resolutions. I wish it were. This, however, involves very little expenditure. The resolution has already passed the Senate. The reason for hastening the matter is that this committee must report upon these subjects by January 1. That is the reason I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution at this time. I inquired of the chairman of the committee about this, and if gentlemen will indulge me I would like to read from a memorandum that he gave me. It would explain the situation better than I can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I call attention to one thing. I do not know that it is sufficient to cause me to object to the consideration of the resolution, but I think there should be an amendment to the resolution which would require that the ranking House Member should also sign these vouchers.

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This provides that the money shall be paid out upon the signature of the chairman of the Senate committee. We are turning over the House contingent fund to be paid out upon the signature of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. IRELAND. I quite agree with the gentleman, but I do not think the gentleman will find it necessary in this particular instance. If there were a considerable sum to be expended, we should have a voice in those expenditures, but they have already provided clerks from the Geodetic Survey and the other departments, so that probably the expense will be limited to just one or two clerks for the remaining period.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I am not raising any question about the expense. Perhaps I do not make myself clear.

Mr. IRELAND. Oh, yes; I understand the gentleman's viewpoint, and I agree with him, but just for the sake of time, can we not forego that in this instance?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I shall not object on that account.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Just one moment, Mr. Speaker; I am still reserving the right to object. Let us see if we can not agree upon an amendment.

Mr. IRELAND. Would it satisfy the gentleman to say that all of these vouchers have to come before the Committee on Accounts and have to be O. K'd by the chairman of that committee, and that we are not exactly in a philanthropic mood.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is largely a matter of preserving the proper respectable place of the House. It is not on account of any anticipation I have that anything wrong is going to be done with the funds that I am raising this question, but where we are paying out of the contingent fund of the House for a joint commission of both the Senate and the House, I think the expenditure should be approved by some man representing the House as well as by the Senate chairman.

Mr. IRELAND. I agree with the general proposition, but to amend the resolution would involve a conference and further delay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SISSON. I object.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his objection to the consideration of the resolution if an amendment is agreed to, and if the amendment be offered which he desires we will adopt it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall offer the amendment to the effect that it shall be certified to by the chairman and vice chairman of the commission.

Mr. IRELAND. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution No. 11, which has previously been reported?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by requiring the amount to be paid out to be certified by the chairman and the vice chairman of the commission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Page 2 of the resolution, line 3, after the word "chairman," insert the words "and vice chairman."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution as amended.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. IRELAND, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of the Speaker, the Chair lays before the House the following report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7848. An act authorizing appropriations and expenditures for the administration of Indian affairs, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FENN was granted leave of absence for two days—October 28 and 29—on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the conference that meets in Washington on November 11.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the conference which meets in Washington on November 11. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not wish to act as censor in any way of extending remarks that may be put in the RECORD, but there has been some question as to whether there should be any discussion whatsoever in either branch of the Congress of the forthcoming conference.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will say to the gentleman I have tried to exercise great care in presenting what I have to present and that is a matter I have had in mind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly at (4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, October 28, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the so-called Walsh amendment and the matter contained on page 78 of the pending bill. This is in a sense a left-over part of a unanimous-consent agreement, and I trust it may be carried out and finished at an early hour this morning. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts is ready to proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I trust that I may have the close attention of the Senate, because we are to discuss to-day what I conceive to be one of the most important provisions of the whole revenue bill. I shall try to present my views briefly and concisely.

We have been discussing and criticizing the pending revenue bill because of its discriminatory features. Senators have vigorously and repeatedly pointed out that this bill seeks to relieve from taxation the highly profitable corporations of the country and the ultrarich. Not one word has yet been said—I will not say one word, but not sufficient emphasis has been placed upon the provisions of the bill that actually increases the tax burden of a very large class of business and manufacturing corporations. In attempting to relieve the people of the country of the excessive tax burdens of the war why should not all classes and all business enterprises alike share in the reduction of taxes that any revised tax measure proposes?

Mr. President, the pending bill actually increases by 50 per cent the taxes of a very substantial number of business concerns in the country. No one disputes that. Let us not confine our arguments merely to pointing out favoritism. Indefensible as favoritism is in a tax law, certainly nothing can be said in favor of a program which in extending favoritism to certain business concerns places an increased tax of 50 per cent upon other businesses. No one in this Chamber can dispute the proposition that this revenue bill provides for an increase of 50 per cent in taxes on a great number of businesses and industries. What businesses and what industries? Not the monopolistic corporations, not the profit-making corporations, but the struggling, competitive, small business concerns of the country which, under the provisions of the pending bill, are to have their tax bills increased 50 per cent.

It is to laugh when we realize that the song that has been sung on the other side of the Chamber from the beginning to the end of this discussion is that business was to be relieved; that the stagnation in industry, which it has been claimed was caused in part by heavy taxes, was to be removed; that business from now on was to be relieved of the heavy burdens of tax imposed during the war! What is the naked truth? What is the real situation?

We have relieved in this bill profit-making corporate business, and that class alone. Not a single other business enterprise or corporation in the country, not a single business in the country that is not making a profit in excess of 8 per cent has been relieved of a dollar of taxation; in fact, corporations of small earnings have been increased. We have relieved the large surtax payer; we have relieved the excess-profit making taxpayer; we have relieved the man of family; we have relieved, in part, the normal taxpayer; but one class—and that is the class for which I speak—the struggling business concerns, the honest business, the corporations which are content with a small profit are penalized under this bill.

How can Senators who support the pending measure confront the business element of this country and claim that this bill is to restore business prosperity and at the same time levy upon the great bulk of the business corporations of this country heavier taxes than during the recent war? The most burdensome taxes ever paid by individuals or business have been increased under this bill upon the lowest class of our corporations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, can not the Senator from Massachusetts at this stage of the proceedings explain his amendment? The amendment has not yet been set forth.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall explain the amendment, but I wish the Senator from Nebraska would permit me to develop my argument, for I want to show, first of all, that there is in this bill an outrageous and unjustified increase in the tax burden which is placed upon certain corporations. I also want to show how this has been brought about, namely, by eliminating the taxes from prosperous corporations. After that presentation, I wish to compare the provisions of the committee amendment with my amendment. That is the path that I should like to pursue.

Why has there been an increase in the taxes upon certain business corporations? That is very easy to explain. The one promise made by Senators on the other side of the Chamber, the one end and object of the majority party in framing this bill, was, first and foremost, to eliminate the excess-profits tax. At all hazards this was to be done. No matter what else happened that tax was to be eliminated, no matter who has to bear the loss in revenue consequent upon its elimination. In that objective Senators on the other side have succeeded. The excess-profits tax, relieving the corporations of this country of $450,000,000 of taxation each year, has been wiped out; it is gone; but in doing that Senators have been confronted with the proposition of seeking somewhere, somehow, the revenue which they lost by the elimination of the excess-profits tax.

So they finally decided that they could recoup the public Treasury for the loss of the excess-profits tax revenue by increasing the tax upon the net incomes of all corporations regardless of whether they were earning small or large profits.

During the World War every corporation paid a 10 per cent tax upon its net income, and all corporations earning over 8 per cent on their invested capital paid in addition an excess-profits tax. The pending measure, as it comes from the Committee on Finance, eliminates the excess-profits tax from corporations, but increases the 10 per cent corporation net income tax from 10 per cent to 15 per cent. The House did not have the effrontery to make the increase more than 12½ per cent, but the Senate Finance Committee was more courageous, and it was fixed at 15 per cent. What has been the result? Every corporation that since the war and during the war made less than 8 per cent on its invested capital has had its tax increased 50 per cent. I challenge contradiction of that statement. Every corporation that has earned less than 8 per cent upon its invested capital, under the provisions of the pending bill, has its tax increased 50 per cent, while every corporation that earned more than 8 per cent has had its taxes substantially reduced.

Think of it! How can our action be justified for after the pending bill shall be enacted into law every corporation earning less than 8 or 10 per cent shall have its tax increased, while every corporation that has been earning over 10 per cent or over 14 per cent, dependent upon the corporation class, will be relieved in large part of the tax burden which it bore during the war; and this at a time when the business of the country is prostrate; this at a time when business is asking for relief; this at a time when the Republican Party is claiming to be friendly to business, to be willing and desirous of helping business, to be anxious to restore business prosperity. Yet the Republican majority would turn to every struggling corporate business in this country and say "If you have not been earning 8 per cent, your tax bill is to be increased; if you have been earning more than 8 per cent, your tax bill is to be reduced." What a preposterous proposition!

Which are the excess profit making corporations that this bill favors? They are usually corporations engaged in a business which controls some natural monopoly; they are corporations which have assumed trust proportions; they are corporations which have special privileges and special rights given by the Government itself, enjoying, indeed, special patents, in many instances. Which are the corporations that are earning less than 8 per cent? They are the competitive corporations and businesses of the Nation; the corporations that have to fight competition and meet competition; that enjoy no special monopolistic privilege; and that have no special exclusive line of business which removes them from the strife and turmoil of competitive business.

Mr. President, there can be no serious contradiction of these facts.

Now, it is proposed, in order to recoup the Public Treasury for some of the revenue lost by the elimination of the excess-profits tax——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question relative to the matter which he just suggested?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated that certain corporations enjoying governmental favors, certain monopolies, were the ones, as a rule, making excess profits. I was wondering whether the investigation by the Senator showed that most of those corporations have but little invested capital, and that they, least of all, are entitled by reason of risk and hazard and large investment to excess profits or to large profits, for that matter?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that is a true statement. As I said the other day, I am not unmindful of the force of the argument in favor of lessening, if, indeed, not eliminating, the excess-profits tax, but I am complaining at the way it has been done, at the manner in which the burden has been shifted. This bill abandons for the present the principle of making excess profit-making corporations pay a higher tax than nonexcess profit-making corporations. No more are we to ask when we come to tax American business concerns and industries, "Are you making profits of a large amount or not?" That principle has been abandoned and the committee has turned to this principle: "Regardless of whether you are making an excess profit or not, regardless of whether you are making 50 or 1 per cent on your invested capital, or regardless of whether you are making 100 per cent or 10 per cent on your invested capital, hereafter you are to pay a tax upon the net income of your corporation, and the tax on your net income is to be increased from 10 per cent to 15 per cent, which amounts to an increase in the tax bill of many corporations of 50 per cent."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would that tax upon the corporations for which the Senator is pleading—and I think justly pleading—wipe out the line of margin between what might be denominated net profits and the dividend datum line so that there would be no dividends to stockholders?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. All questions of profits or of dividends, or the amount of dividends, or the extent or volume of the earning on the invested capital are eliminated, and we come down to the bare proposition of fixing the rate we shall tax corporations upon their net income. I oppose decreasing the taxes of some corporations and increasing the taxes of other corporations.

The committee proposes to impose a flat tax upon the net income of corporations. I protest and object to that method. I argue for a graduated tax upon the net income of corporations just as we have a graduated tax upon the net income of individuals.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senator explain one feature of his amendment. I think probably he intends to cover the matter, but it seems to me to be the very foundation of the argument or of any argument that may be made, and that is this:

The Senator, of course, as a member of the committee knows that one of the principal arguments that induced doing away with the excess-profits tax was that the enormously capitalized corporations probably would have no excess-profits tax, and therefore would go untaxed entirely, and therefore the flat tax—which was inequitable in that it had no relation to the percentage of the earnings—was imposed. It seems to me, however—and on this point I want the Senator's explanation—that the Senator's amendment has exaggerated that difficulty.

We will take a corporation of $100,000,000 capital. It makes $200,000 net income. That $200,000, however, represents only 2 mills on the dollar. It would hardly declare a dividend, and yet 2 mills on the dollar of $100,000,000 woud bring in $200,000. The Senator would levy a tax of 10 per cent on the first $100,000 and 15 per cent upon the second $100,000 even though that 15 per cent is levied upon what is only 2 mills of profit upon the investment, whereas another corporation, say of $100,000 capital, that makes $200,000 makes 200 per cent, and it pays a tax on the second $100,000 of the 200 per cent no higher than the other corporation would pay on the 2 mills, or two ten-thousandths of 200 per cent. It seems to me that there is one grave difficulty in the Senator's amendment, and I should like to hear him on that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the question is so long and involved, necessarily so, that it is difficult to answer; but I will state that both my amendment and the committee amendment are defective in that in placing taxes upon corporations the relativity between invested capital and profits is not a factor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yours is defective, and so is mine. I am accepting your theory, in which I do not believe. I am taking the proposition which you put forth here, that we will raise this revenue by an increased tax upon net incomes of corporations. I am accepting your theory, but seeking to improve it, as it is the only way open to raise revenue from corporations, in view of the elimination of the excess-profits tax. My amendment and the committee amendment are both defective; but I argue that my amendment is better than yours, because yours is a guess, pure and simple, as to how it will burden corporations, while mine is an attempt to apply to corporations the principle "of ability to pay." Yours, I repeat, is a guess. All pay alike under your amendment. The corporation with 100 per cent profit and the corporation with 1 per cent profit must both pay upon their net incomes 15 per cent under the committee amendment.

My amendment, I repeat, seeks to apply to corporations the principle of ability to pay. That is the principle which we apply to the incomes of individuals. We say that the man with an income of $3,000 has not the ability to pay as much taxes as the man with an income of $30,000. In fact, we say that the man with an income of $30,000 can pay ten times as much taxes and not be injured any more than the man with an income of $3,000. Why not apply the same principle to corporations? If corporations were honestly organized, if corporations were efficiently managed, if watered stock were eliminated from corporations, the same principle would apply in the yield of income to corporations as to individuals. If a heavily capitalized corporation has not a net income sufficient to pay a substantial dividend to its stockholders, it is because it is poorly managed, its business in inefficiently carried on, or there is an overissue of stock and it is not a sound corporation doing business in an efficient manner.

The amendment which I propose, applying this principle of ability to pay, provides that a corporation, regardless of its capital stock issue, regardless of its invested capital, shall pay 10 per cent upon the first $100,000 income, shall pay 15 per cent upon the income between $100,000 and $300,000, and shall pay 20 per cent upon the net income in excess of $300,000; while the amendment of the committee provides that the corporation with a net income of $1,000, of $10,000, of $50,000, of $100,000, of $500,000, or of $1,000,000 shall pay 15 per cent. Which is the more equitable?

I recognize the fact that in that group of corporations whose net incomes are $100,000 there are some corporations that now pay high excess-profits tax. There is no doubt about that.

I recognize the fact that in the group of corporations that have net incomes in excess of $300,000 there are corporations which pay no excess-profits tax; but on what other sound principle can you proceed? My suggestion is no more inequitable than to compel a corporation with $100,000 net income to pay 15 per cent and to compel a corporation with $500,000 net income to pay 15 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not want to disturb the continuity of the Senator's argument.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] yesterday, in the admirable address which he delivered, directed our attention to the fact that many of the large corporations of the United States, those of large capital, such as the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., had stockholders in excess of 60,000, and some other corporations had stockholders of the number of ninety to one hundred thousand. He also directed our attention to the fact that many of these corporations that had large capital and a large number of stockholders had comparatively small earnings based upon the capital, and that the dividends, the net profits, were small, based upon the capital, not comparable to the net profits of many of the smaller corporations. Would not the Senator's amendment, which exacts a tax of 20 per cent upon the amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000, strike more heavily at the corporations that have a large number of stockholders, whose holdings are small and whose dividends will be small, and would it not penalize poor people rather than strike at those corporations that are making enormous profits, and whose profits are confined to a very few when distributed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It so happens that there are only a few corporations, less than 5,000, in the group of which the Senator speaks, earning in excess of $300,000 net income, while there are about 195,000 corporations in the group that earn less than $300,000; and in view of the fact that every single corporation that has earned less than 8 per cent upon its capital stock has had its tax increased 50 per cent, I am seeking to find some way to prevent penalizing the great number of corporations which are included in that 195,000. I agree with the Senator that my amendment is not perfect, but every single argument against my amendment can be made against the amendment of the committee. The only advantage my amendment has is that in the case of those corporations that are handling small sums of money, that have small net incomes—the small real-estate associations of this country, the small struggling manufacturer, the public service corporations of this country, which have small net incomes—the possibilities are that their tax will not be increased under my amendment, while it is certain their tax will be increased under the amendment offered by the committee. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. KING. The Senator does.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Would the Senator object to amending his amendment by adding a proviso like this?—

Provided, That in the case of public utilities whose rates and charges are subject to regulation by law or by administrative action pursuant to law, the rate will be 10 per cent, regardless of the amount of the net income.

That is to reach the case just referred to by the Senator from Utah, and to which I referred yesterday, of these public utilities. Their rates are regulated by law, and any increase of tax there simply means the increase of the rates allowed by law upon transportation, as in the case of railroads, street railways, and that sort of thing. It seems to me that those concerns ought not to be penalized on the basis of the aggregate earnings, and they are the ones to which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would be most burdensome.

I should like to have the Senator consider the advisability of adding such a proviso to his amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to consider the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico. I want to add that my sole purpose in offering this amendment is to prevent a revenue bill being enacted by Congress which indiscriminately provides that every other business corporation in the country—and it affects 50 per cent of them—shall have their taxes increased. The elimination of the excess-profits tax and the increase in the net income tax have increased the taxes upon 50 per cent of the business corporations of this country, and increased their taxes substantially. I am seeking to get a measure through this Senate which will permit a reduction in taxes to every business concern in this country, and not limit its beneficent provisions merely to those corporations that have heretofore been making excess profits.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has pointed out a defect in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which he admits; but he counters by pointing out the fact that the same defect exists in the amendment proposed by the majority of the Finance Committee, and I take it that the Senator from North Dakota admits that defect; in other words, it is substantially the same. At least, the defect is the same in character.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has called attention to the public utilities of the country, and it is conceded, I think, that during the past year the net earnings of the railroads were less than three-tenths of 1 per cent. It seems to me that we can not disregard entirely one of the fundamental rules of taxation, namely, that the taxpayers should pay in accordance with their ability. I realize, of course, that there are modifications of that rule. Why can not the majority of the committee and the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Mexico get together and try to prepare an amendment or a scheme which will eliminate the very objection which every one of those Senators seems to admit is in all of these amendments? I think that can be done.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We can not do it without taking into consideration the profits that corporations make.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that; but it is the profits with reference to the stockholdings which must be taken into consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We are both in sympathy with that view. That sound tax theory has been abandoned by the other side.

Mr. POMERENE. There was a time, for instance, when the railroad stocks of the country were held in large blocks by the so-called Wall Street crowd, but I think anyone who has studied this problem will find that Wall Street has gotten out from under that load, largely, and railroad securities now are held either by the insurance companies, which have invested their moneys in those securities, or the smaller and poorer class of people, who hold the most of those securities.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I admitted in the few remarks I made that when we change our system from an excess-profits tax to a flat tax there is more or less injustice in it, and certainly it is illogical to the extent, at least, of the 10 per cent; but we were forced, it seemed to us, to levy the flat tax as a substitute in order to get the revenue from those large corporations whose stock issues were so great that in no case could we expect to get over the 8 per cent; and it is pretty hard for anyone to say just exactly what their capital investment is. Admitting that that is not entirely a logical tax, that it taxes the corporation where the hundred thousand represents 1 per cent the same as where it represents 10 or 20 or 100 per cent, my point was that the Senator's amendment exaggerated that and made it just so much worse by levying the very much higher taxes.

Thus, as I stated, if a corporation had a hundred million dollars in capital invested and it made $200,000, it would have made only 2 mills on the dollar. A man who holds that stock and could get a dividend of only 2 mills upon his stock would have pretty good ground to object if that 2 mills was taxed 15 per cent, so that he could not even get his 2 mills of a dividend. But I have not seen any way, and the Senator from Massachusetts perhaps has not found any midway proposition, by which we could bridge this over and at the same time get the money from these very large corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, my proposition at least provides that if the excess-profits tax is to be eliminated there shall be no increase in the tax of the corporations that have not made excess profits, and in that group are over 100,000 corporations, while the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota compels an increase in the taxes of all this class. His amendment forces every single one of this class of corporations to pay a 50 per cent increase in their tax bills. My amendment at least gives a remedy to all in this class—non-excess-profits class—who have not a net income of over $300,000. In other words, after my amendment is adopted no corporation will pay more taxes than it pays now, if it is a nonexcess-profit-making corporation with a small net income, while the Senator's amendment will compel over 50 per cent of these corporations of this country to pay an increased tax bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I understand the virtues of the excess-profits tax and I also recognize, I think, its vices; but it seems to me that while the majority of the committee has sought to eliminate the excess-profits tax, which they claim to be bad and which has some bad features, I admit, they are giving us a scheme of taxation which is more vicious and is going to be more inequitable than the excess-profits tax. Both the members of the majority of the committee and the members of the minority of the committee admit that the scheme of taxation which is embraced in these several amendments has one vice. Why can we not get together and eliminate it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the suggestions of the Senator from Ohio are admirable, and some way ought to be found to eliminate the objections to this proposed change in the corporation tax. But I repeat, any Senator who votes for my amendment will vote to keep the present corporation tax upon nearly all nonexcess-profits-making corporations the same. It at least seeks to prevent an increase of 50 per cent on the business that has to struggle and fight to earn a normal dividend.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this morning I received a large number of telegrams severely condemning the action of the Senate in increasing the taxes from 32 per cent to 50 per cent, as if that were a great injustice. I can not sympathize with the men who sent those telegrams, except that necessarily we all desire to have taxes as low as possible. But there are various security holders who may have their little savings in some corporation or other that have not earned 6 per cent, many of them less than 2 or 3 per cent, and by this method of taxation we are penalizing every one of the stockholders in those corporations by adding a 15 per cent tax, or something in excess of that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator's statement is a contribution to the discussion.

I want to summarize, in a very few sentences, just the difference between the amendment of the committee and my amendment.

In fixing a flat tax of 15 per cent on net incomes of corporations, no tax principle whatever has been invoked, while my amendment seeks to apply the same theory upon which the income taxes of individuals rest, namely, the ability to pay. If ability to pay is a sound foundation for taxes on personal incomes, then it is a sound foundation for taxes on corporation incomes. If the individual be forced to pay a graduated income tax, why should not corporations also be forced to pay a graduated tax on their incomes? If one principle is sound, then the other is sound. What are corporations? They are groups of individuals, and I contend that the same principle which we apply in imposing an income tax upon individuals should apply to corporations, and if the groups of individuals are honestly organized and honestly managed, the rule and principle of a graduated income tax will work out equitably with corporations as with individuals.

The removal of the profits tax and the substitution of a flat corporation income tax is a direct step away from the principle of ability to pay. It is a move directly beneficial to monopolies and trusts, which alone, of all business institutions, are certain of being able to make excess profits when business revives.

All restraint on the making of profits is abandoned forever under this bill, because, no matter how much profit a corporation may make, it is to be taxed the same identical rate as a corporation that makes substantially no profit. Competitive business is penalized, under the majority amendment.

Let me quote what the Manufacturers' News, of Chicago, a leading industrial paper of this country, says about this committee amendment. Referring to the tax which the committee amendment proposes to impose, it says:

> This tax will hit thousands of small manufacturers below the belt.

This tax, this amendment, will hit thousands of small manufacturing corporations below the belt, because it increases the taxes 50 per cent upon every small nonexcess-profit-making corporation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It seems to me quite in line with the argument being made by the Senator from Massachusetts to suggest to him to inquire of the committee what its reason was for including Coca-Cola among soft drinks, and to ask if the imemdiate result of its action in doing so was not to send up enormously the price of that fatal beverage, as the Senator will see from the New York quotations of yesterday.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator from Georgia for his reference to the effect that another section of the tax bill has already had upon the beverage to which he referred.

Mr. President, let us come down to cases. Let me take from the files of the Treasury Department two typical corporations and examine their returns. We will consider the statement which they made, the return which they presented, and the tax which they paid in the year 1919, and then we will inquire if the bill which the majority proposes to enact had been the law in 1919, what would have been the difference in the tax which these two corporations would pay.

The first corporation had an invested capital of $135,135,151. It is what we call a large corporation. It had, as shown by its return, a net income of $31,652,279. It paid in 1919 an excess-profits tax of $3,098,375. If the present bill, with the amendment proposed by the majority members of the committee, had been the law in 1919, this corporation would have paid no excess-profits tax, but in its place would have paid a tax upon its net income increased from 10 to 15 per cent, which would amount to $1,435,000. In other words, this corporation, if it carries on in 1923 the same business that it did in 1919, would save approximately $3,500,000 in taxes. This means that the change in the excess-profits tax and the increase in the income tax from 10 to 15 per cent will mean a tax bill for this large and highly prosperous corporation of $3,500,000 less than during the year 1919.

Let us take a small corporation and examine its tax bill for the same year, 1919. This typical corporation had an invested capital of $102,576. It had a net income of $10,430. It earned 10 per cent on its invested capital, therefore, it had no excess-profits tax to pay, although it had an income of $10,430 ($2,000 of net income is exempt under the law). Its taxable income was $8,430, which, at 10 per cent, made the tax $843.

It is to be noted that we are dealing with a small corporation earning 10 per cent on its capital stock, and yet, under the most burdensome tax law ever imposed on business and upon individuals, with all the tax burdens of the late war; this corporation paid in 1919, at the war peak, tax rates $843.

Under the provisions of the pending bill, had this measure been the law in 1919, this corporation would have paid $1,264. This corporation doing the same business in 1923 that it did in 1919 will have to pay 50 per cent more tax—over $400 more tax in time of peace—after the Congress has passed a bill claiming to relieve our people of the burden of war taxation.

How can the Republican majority justify that? How can you go forward and talk to the country about the Republican Party being a friend of business? How can you defend this course?

Mr. KING. The Senator means the Republican Party is a friend of big business.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Utah suggests that I should amend my statement by saying that the Republican Party is a friend of big business, not a friend of business.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. A friend of big profits instead of big business.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The fact remains that this committee amendment is the vital weakness of this bill. It can not be explained. It can not be justified. It has called forth a protest from every business concern in the country that has not been making excess profits, because it attempts now to increase the tax bills of the industries and businesses of the country which are not overprosperous.

Let me resume the conclusion that the comparison of these two corporations leads to. The tax on the large corporation, earning 25 per cent a year, is under the present bill decreased 40 per cent, while the tax of the small corporation earning 10 per cent is increased 52 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to know how many corporations in the country have their taxes increased and how many have them decreased?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is estimated that the number of corporations which pay an excess-profits tax is about 100,000. There are approximately 300,000 corporations altogether. About 100,000 of that number file a return showing no net income. About 100,000 file returns showing excess profits. One hundred thousand more show net incomes less than 8 per cent; in other words, 100,000 have a net income less than that which brings them within the excess-profits class. If I am not correct I hope the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will correct me.

My amendment seeks to keep the tax at exactly what the rate now is upon that class of 100,000 corporations which are not and have not been earning excess profits. It also will work out to the benefit of the excess-profits class or some of the corporations in the excess-profits class because some of them are in the brackets showing a net income of less than $100,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wanted to know how many corporations now in the country are going to be relieved by the bill as presented by the committee and their taxes lessened, and how many are going to have their taxes increased? I wish to see whether the bill is in the interest of big business or not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is a mere guess or approximation, but I should say that 50,000 corporations will have their taxes reduced, and 150,000 corporations have their taxes increased under the provisions of the pending bill. My amendment would tend to keep the taxes from being increased upon the 195,000 corporations that are outside the class of excess profit producing.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. In this connection I think it is important that we consider also the invested capital which will have its taxes increased by the committee amendment, although they are the corporations which are showing a smaller income. In the report of the majority of the committee there is a table which bears upon this subject and gives us some information. That table I introduced in connection with my remarks on yesterday, and it shows that even in the prosperous year 1919 over half of the invested capital of corporations was paying 10 per cent or less.

Mr. POMERENE. How much in amount was it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amount of invested capital in those two brackets was a little over $30,000,000,000, and the total invested capital of all the corporations making their returns for the year 1919 was only $56,290,000,000. So that the plan proposed by the committee is to actually increase the burden on over one-half of the capital invested in business in the country and which is making a small profit. I have no doubt that in the present state of depression in the country the volume of earnings less than 10 per cent is very much increased.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am pleased that the Senator from New Mexico called my attention to the table which he introduced yesterday. That leads me to a consideration of some tables which I desire to have introduced in the RECORD.

I have before me several tables showing that the proposed bill decreases the taxes of those corporations earning from 12 per cent to 100 per cent a year on their investment, in an amount ranging from 1 per cent to 55 per cent. According to these tables this bill also increases the tax on those corporations earning less than 12 per cent in amounts ranging from 1 per cent to 48 per cent. Just reflect upon those figures! There is nothing in this whole revenue bill so inequitable, so unjust, so indefensible.

In seeking to reduce the burden of taxation on business what has the Republican majority done? They have taken the taxes off of those corporations earning a tremendous return on their capital and they have shifted that tax burden to those corporations earning only a normal return on their investment.

The following table shows the number of corporations within various income brackets.

The figures are based upon the returns for the year 1918, which is the last year for which accurate returns are available. The number of corporations in that year that had a net income of less than $10,000 was 148,150. I call attention to the table for the purpose of showing the very large number of corporations that are within the first bracket of the amendment proposed by me, namely, the corporations that have a net income of less than $100,000. The number of corporations having a net income of from $10,000 to $50,000 was 37,053; from $50,000 to $100,000 the number was 7,224; from $100,000 to $250,000 the number is 5,383; from $250,000 to $500,000 the number is 2,054; from $500,000 to $1,000,000 the number is 1,171; from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000 the number is 846; and from $5,000,000 and over the number is 180. The total number of corporations showing income in the varying amounts stated was 202,061; and 115,518 corporations showed no income, making the total of all corporations making returns 317,579.

Based upon returns for 1918, the number of corporations that are within the brackets named in my amendment is as follows: Corporations that showed a net income of less than $100,000 in 1918 were 191,000. So at least I propose to impose a less tax on the net incomes of 191,000 corporations than the committee bill proposes—the rate on that number of corporations being under my amendment the same as the present law, 10 per cent.

The number of corporations in the bracket between $100,000 and $200,000 is 5,000; the number of corporations in the bracket between $200,000 and $400,000 a year is approximately 1,500; from $400,000 to $500,000, about 1,500; and over $500,000 nearly 1,000.

It is claimed that under the committee bill there will be a revenue of $660,000,000 derived by the proposed increase from 10 to 15 per cent in the net income tax on all corporations.

The amount which will be raised under the amendment proposed by me is $602,500,000. Again we come to figures that are problematical. When I first suggested my amendment to one of the experts he said the amount that would be raised would be identical with that raised under the committee amendment, but since that time there has been some change in his estimate, and he now thinks that my amendment will not raise quite so much as the committee amendment.

I offer for the RECORD the table to which I have referred. It shows the corporation tax returns for the year 1918 and the estimated corporation income returns for the year 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

Committee bill, $4,600,000, at 15 per cent, equals $690,000,000; as in report, $660,000,000.

This table shows that 202,060 corporations made income returns. One hundred and fifteen thousand five hundred and eighteen made a return with no net income. Total corporations, 317,579.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this table shows that approximately 190,000 corporations have a net income under $100,000; that 8,000 corporations have an income between $100,000 and $500,000; that 1,200 have an income between $500,000 and $1,000,000; that 850 have an income between $1,000,000 and $5,000,000; and that 180 have an income over $5,000,000. My amendment will therefore lessen the corporation tax upon all corporations with a net income under $300,000, which number about 195,000 corporations, and will increase the tax provided for in the committee bill upon less than 5,000 corporations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what would be the amount of revenue raised from the corporation tax in the event the present law were continued?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the event the present law should be continued, the amount that would be raised would be about four hundred million dollars. The tax under the present law is 10 per cent on the net income of corporations; the committee seeks to increase that to 15 per cent, which will add about two hundred and fifty million dollars more, making about six hundred and fifty million dollars. My amendment proposes a tax in excess of 15 per cent on certain classes of corporations; namely, those corporations that earn over three hundred million dollars net income, which I propose to have pay a tax of 20 per cent. Therefore, under my amendment there will be obtained from that group of corporations a larger revenue than will be derived from the flat 15 per cent tax proposed by the committee. The corporations embraced in that group have large net incomes and, of course, comprise the "big business" of the country. They may not be the business concerns that make the most profits, but they are the business concerns that handle the greatest volume of business, handle the greatest volume of money, and make the largest showing of net income; they are the monopolistic, the trusts, the big corporations of the country.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, under the Senator's amendment, if I recollect correctly, the tax will commence to be heavier on a corporation having a net income of $400,000. Below that sum the tax will be lighter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to that feature of my amendment, in which, I ought to add, the Senator from Rhode Island has had a share and part in formulating. If there is any merit in my amendment the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island is entitled to share it.

My amendment is so drafted that even those corporations which appear to pay 15 per cent upon their net income will actually pay a less tax than under the committee amendment, which imposes a flat tax of 15 per cent, because those in the group from $100,000 to $300,000 of net income will have the benefit of the lower 10 per cent rate on the first $100,000 of income. Does the Senator from Ohio follow me?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, did the Senator indicate whether he would accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I did not. I am very sympathetic toward the amendment, I will say to the Senator, but I do not want to confuse this issue. I want to consider the amendment, and if I think it will contribute in accomplishing the purpose I am seeking to accomplish I shall be very glad to accept it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is a question which I desire to put to the Senator. If he does not accept that amendment, will not the effect of his amendment be to increase the taxes on the railroads of the country; will not the power which fixes railroad rates take into account the amount of the taxes paid; and will not that be an excuse for maintaining high railroad freight rates?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think there is a good deal in what the Senator from Nebraska says; I think that is true; but I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if there are many railroad corporations that to-day have a net income in excess of $300,000?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I judge that most of the large railroads have an income——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A net income.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A net income of over $300,000, because that is a mere nominal profit on their enormous capitalization.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought that our railroads were losing money and that there were very few of them that showed a substantial net income upon their business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A railroad may be making a profit of $1,000,000 a year and yet that would be very small compared to its enormous capitalization.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the net income of all of the railroads during the past calendar year, I think, was $63,000,000, which made an average of less than three-tenths of 1 per cent. Let me remind the Senator further that during that year that net income included $60,000,000 of back pay which the railroads received from the Government for carrying the mail.

One of the reasons I favored the elimination of a tax on freight and transportation was that necessarily such a tax increases the cost to the traveler and to the shipper, thereby adding largely to the present high cost of living. Now, under either the Senate committee amendment or under the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts there will be an increase. Under the Senate committee amendment there will be an increase in the taxes from 10 to 15 per cent, and under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts there will be a graduated increase provided for, so that in either event another reason will be afforded for the keeping up of present high traffic charges. I think we want to avoid that.

I am sorry to interrupt the Senator further, but I wish now to thank him for one thing: He has made perfectly clear to my mind one fact upon which I have been seeking light ever since this debate began, and that is why there was an effort to force this bill through with little or no debate. If I had been one of the sponsors for this bill, I also would have wanted to force it through without debate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I appreciate the compliment which the Senator from Ohio has paid me. I feel that the amendment which I offer at least calls attention to the fact that the pending bill does not relieve but penalizes business, and that, too, the businesses of the country that need aid, that need assistance, that need encouragement, that need to be relieved from excessive war-tax burdens.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator in his amendment is providing what we have been calling brackets—two brackets, 15 per cent and 20 per cent. In my opinion his amendment effectuates some reform, and is just, based, of course, as it is, upon an imperfect foundation, because he was forced to take the imperfect foundation which was submitted by the committee. The question I was about to propound the Senator was this: If the two gradations of 15 and 20 per cent do effectuate some relief and some reform, would there not be greater relief and some further justice consummated if he were to introduce further gradations?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him there, of course I had to start with the bracket which retained the present tax at 10 per cent. The Senator will understand that.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I also had to meet the fact that the highest rate imposed by the committee amendment was 15 per cent.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that I was necessarily limited in the number of brackets that I could formulate because of the fact that the percentages should not go below 10 per cent and should not go very high over 15 per cent. So I began with 10 per cent on the corporations with small net incomes. With the so-called middle-class corporations with net incomes from $100,000 to $300,000 I made the rate the same as the committee rate, and then on those with very large net incomes I put the advanced rate of 20 per cent. The Senator will appreciate the difficulties in making an amendment that recognized the principle that the nonexcess-profit-making corporations ought not to have their taxes increased. That is the one object I have had in mind in formulating this amendment. I am trying to have Congress say to this substantial element of our business concerns: "Though we have not given you any relief, we at least have not increased your taxes."

Mr. KING. I appreciate the almost insuperable objections that attend any modification of this bill dealing with this feature upon the basis which has been formulated and presented by the committee.

I had hoped that some provision might be offered as a substitute which would take into account the profits of the corporations as the basis of this tax, so that while the excess-profits tax has been eliminated there might be introduced as a substitute for it a measure by which the taxes upon the corporations would be based upon the profits and the ratio which the profits bore to the legitimate capital-stock investment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator will bear in mind that we have had amendment after amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and other Senators seeking to do that very thing. They have all been voted down. I withheld offering my amendment until we were confronted with the issue of increasing, by adopting this amendment, the tax upon the normal profit-making business concerns of this country; and I want to fight my amendment out along the line of seeking to prevent an increased tax burden upon one-half of the business concerns of this country. You have got to say to every other corporation, every other business concern, every other business man that you meet who is an officer of a corporation or interested in the management of a corporation, if this committee amendment is adopted: "Under this revenue bill we have increased your tax."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the more light that is thrown into the dark recesses of this bill, the more apparent become its enormities, its delinquencies, and its oppressive character. When the amendments shall all have been offered I shall move to recommit this bill, if the majority refuses to accept amendments, with instructions to formulate a measure that will take into account the profits of corporations and deal with them in a just and equitable way, not penalizing legitimate business, but basing the taxes to be derived by the Government upon the profits of the corporation, and a ratio to be established between the profits and the legitimate capital stock of the corporation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire now to quote from a statement given to the public by the National Association of Credit Men in September, after this bill was reported to the Senate, and I want to read what this association had to say about the committee amendment under discussion:

> We are unalterably opposed to any increase in the rate of normal tax levied on the income of corporations. The increase of the normal tax upon corporations from 10 per cent to 15 per cent will affect thousands of corporations whose rate of earning is so low as not to be reached by the excess-profits tax, the very corporations least able to bear it. Increasing the tax burden of such corporations by 50 per cent is indefensible. In the present business depression it may be calamitous.

Now, let me read from a brief presented to the Finance Committee by the real estate interests of the city of Boston. I might say that very vigorous, very intense opposition to this committee amendment has been made by the real estate interests of this country. I do not know whether you realize it or not, but very few of the real estate trusts in the big cities of this country earn any substantial return upon their investment. That is an astounding fact—very few of them. In the city of Boston I doubt if 5 per cent of the real estate trusts earn 6 per cent on their investment. In fact, I will show from some figures I have here that most of them earn only 2 or 3 per cent; yet practically every real estate trust in the country—the investment, as the Senator knows, of widows, trustees, and other highly conservative investors—is to have its tax bill doubled because it is not among the excess-profits-making corporations.

When we consider the building situation in this country, when we consider the need of housing our people, when we consider the need of restoring business prosperity by commencing large building undertakings that have been suspended during the war, we can appreciate what a very, very bad effect this increased tax is going to have upon that class of corporations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that a great many of the large business buildings of the country are owned by corporations; a great many of the large apartment buildings here in the city of Washington are owned by corporations; and if they are to have their income taxes increased by 50 per cent, will it not necessarily result in a raise of the rents?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly; that is self-evident.

Let me read from this brief:

> With the present housing and building shortage and a lack of offices and buildings, it is most important to encourage new building. This can not be done if higher rates of taxation are imposed on the income from this class of property. In the first place higher taxes tend to make it impossible to put up buildings which can compete with other buildings built when the cost of construction was much lower. In the second place the present returns on this class of property appear to be so low that it discourages all new capital from making new investments of this character.
> If the new revenue legislation proposes a substitute for the present excess-profits tax, then the rate of taxation on these real estate corporations should not be increased, because they do not pay excess-profits taxes at the present time, and so additional taxes on their profits mean a real increase of taxation and not a substitution.
> The improved real estate in which corporations and associations of this class invest bear the great bulk of local taxation. The annual rate in Boston was $24.10 last year upon the assessed value of land and buildings, and the assessments are the full value of the properties.

Then follows a list of such real estate associations, with their net earnings. I will only read the conclusion:

> The present Federal taxes add to the local taxes from 6 per cent to 8 per cent more of the net earnings before taxes.
> The annexed sheet shows the dividend rates of a few of these real estate associations. One pays at the rate of 8 per cent; two at 7 per cent; five at 6 per cent; and half of them at 4 per cent or less.

Not a single one of the real estate investment companies that are included in this list, a very large number, pays over 8 per cent.

I ought to say that they are office-building companies, not apartment-house real estate companies, companies that develop real estate in the very heart of our great cities. These concerns are largely interested in office buildings in the city of Boston. So, if it is true that the real estate interests of the country that have pooled their capital and have organized real estate investment associations, have not been paying excess-profits taxes, then they are to have an additional burden as the result of this proposed bill.

I now call attention to another table which I present. This table shows the tax of six representative large corporations, computed under existing law and under the pending bill. It shows that these corporations would pay a good deal less tax under the pending bill than they paid under the former law, which provided for an excess-profits tax. I shall not take the time to analyze this table. It is very illuminating. It only goes to develop the argument I am trying to make here, that this bill does favor business, does help business, does lift burdens from business, but only one class of business—the excess-profits-making business concerns of the country. This statement, I should say, was prepared by experts, and is an actual statement of returns made by corporations in the year indicated in the table.

I offer this statement for the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

The tax of six representative large corporations, computed under the existing law and under the proposed bill, is given below. These corporations were picked at random from the largest in the United States. These figures are based upon the returns of the corporations for 1920, the latest year for which figures are available.

Invested capital.	Net income.	Tax under existing law.	Tax under proposed bill.
$7,937,801	$2,970,600	$960,207	$445,590
$11,448,875	6,053,020	2,205,017	907,953
$4,076,390	1,577,248	517,814	236,587
$55,281,989	51,667,660	15,912,826	7,750,149
$1,666,536,898	187,977,752	28,290,761	28,196,662
$172,500,000	12,880,000	1,120,600	1,932,000

An analysis of the above figures shows that the first four corporations earned profits for one year ranging from 22 per cent of the capital invested to 54 per cent of the capital invested. The proposed bill would reduce their taxes approximately 50 per cent. The fifth corporation earned 10 per cent on its capital invested, and the proposed bill would reduce its tax only a fraction of 1 per cent. The sixth corporation earned 7 per cent on its capital invested, and the proposed bill would increase its tax.

It would seem from the above that the proposed bill would reduce approximately 50 per cent the taxes paid by those corporations earning abnormally large profits, considering the capital invested, and would increase the taxes of the corporation earning just the normal 7 or 8 per cent return on its capital.

The returns for 1920 of 41 comparatively small corporations, invested capital of about $100,000, were secured. These returns were selected at random and not with the idea of demonstrating any particular fact. The figures for 10 of these 41 small corporations follow:

Invested capital.	Taxable income.	Tax under existing law.	Tax under proposed bill.
$100,000	$2,412	$41	$62
$100,171	4,226	223	334
$104,790	6,638	461	695
$100,000	8,519	652	977
$99,359	12,774	1,406	1,616
$100,611	16,745	2,265	2,212
$100,830	25,316	5,824	3,497
$100,600	33,070	9,402	4,660
$103,347	34,742	12,511	4,911
$99,873	38,930	21,334	8,539

Of these 41 corporations, 23 earned less than 14 per cent on the capital invested. The proposed bill increases the tax on these 23 corporations from a fraction of 1 per cent to 50 per cent. Eighteen of these corporations earned from 14 per cent to 58 per cent on the capital invested. The proposed bill decreased their tax in an amount ranging from 1 per cent to 66 per cent. It appears here, as with the large corporations, that the proposed bill increases the tax on those corporations earning a normal return on the capital invested, 14 per cent and less, and reduces the tax of those corporations earning abnormal profits from 14 per cent to 58 per cent. The corporation whose tax is most decreased is the corporation which earns the greatest return on the investment, and the decrease of the tax bears a direct relation to the percentage of return on capital invested. These figures would also seem to prove that the statement that the proposed bill benefits the small corporation rather than the large corporation is without foundation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I regret that I have taken so much time. I think the members of the committee will agree that the subject matter under discussion is one of great importance; and I think the members of the committee will agree, too, that we ought, if possible, to find some way of decreasing the tax burdens upon the business corporations of the country that have been earning only a normal profit in the past.

I want to say again that I offer this amendment in a constructive way, and not in a destructive spirit. I want to help to improve this bill. I want to help to relieve the honest, struggling business industries of this country from the additional burden which this legislation is to impose upon them. I hope that the suggestion made by me will be met in a nonpartisan way, and that the Members of the Senate on the other side of the Chamber will see the importance and the necessity of doing something to prevent an increase of 50 per cent in the taxes of this large group of worthy corporations.

Just a single word of warning. You can not answer the criticism that will be made against the corporation features of this bill. It has a single purpose—the elimination of the tax on highly prosperous corporations and the increase of the tax upon those corporations that are making a scant profit.

I repeat, my amendment is not perfect; the committee amendment is not perfect. The principle and theory upon which they are both founded may well be attacked; but my amendment at least does not increase the taxes upon the smaller corporations in the country. The committee amendment increases the tax upon all those corporations which have been earning less than 10 per cent, and decreases the tax upon the corporations which have been earning more than 10 per cent. My amendment gives relief to those who need relief; the committee amendment gives relief to those who do not need relief. That is the issue; that is the question that my amendment presents.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment which I ask to have printed and lie on the table. I also ask to have the amendment printed in the RECORD, except that part which is the soldiers' bonus bill, and I ask to have a statement go into the RECORD to the effect that "here follows the soldiers' bonus bill as heretofore introduced and reported by the committee." I ask, however, that the whole be printed as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and lie on the table and also be printed in the RECORD as indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. REED is as follows:

Amend title 3, page 130, by striking out all of said title on page 130 and page 131 to and including line 10 on page 131 and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE III.—WAR-PROFITS AND EXCESS-PROFITS TAX FOR 1921.

PART 1.—GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 300. That when used in this title the terms "taxable year," "fiscal year," "personal-service corporation," "paid or accrued," and "dividends" shall have the same meaning as provided for the purposes of income tax in sections 200 and 201.

PART 2.—IMPOSITION OF TAX.

SEC. 301. (a) That in lieu of the tax imposed by title 3 of the revenue act of 1918, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the calendar year 1921 and each year thereafter upon the net income of every corporation (except corporations taxable under subdivision (c) of this section) a tax equal to the sum of the following:

FIRST BRACKET.

Twenty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under section 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital;

SECOND BRACKET.

Forty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

The monies derived from such taxes shall constitute a separate fund and shall be devoted so far as necessary to pay and discharge the obligations created by paragraph (b) of this amendment.

(At this point follows the text of the soldiers' bonus bill as heretofore introduced and reported by the committee.)

Provided, That if at any time the funds collected under the provisions of section 300 and section 301, paragraph (a) as amended, are not sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act and additional funds to fully carry out said provisions are not appropriated, the funds created under said sections shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury until a sufficient amount has accumulated to discharge a class of unpaid obligations, and payments by classes shall be made in the order of maturity. The obligations created by this paragraph shall be postponed until sufficient monies have accumulated as aforesaid.

(c) For the calendar year 1921 there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the net income of every corporation which derives in such a year a net income of more than $10,000 from any Government contract or contracts made between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, a tax equal to the sum of the following.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I realize that the chairman of the committee is desirious of getting a vote on this amendment, and I shall occupy only briefly the time of the Senate.

I am disposed to agree with the Senator from Massachusetts that the present corporation tax imposes a great burden on the smaller corporations, and some measure of relief should be placed in this bill as it is drawn; but I go still further. I believe that not only is the 15 per cent tax in the Senate amendments unwise, but I believe that the 12½ per cent tax of the House provision is unwise.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] proposes to reduce the 15 per cent to 10 per cent on corporations whose net incomes do not exceed $100,000, but to vastly increase the corporation tax imposed upon corporations where there is an excess beyond $100,000, and it is to that subject that I wish to address myself, because I do not believe in the burden that is imposed upon business in this bill. I believe it is a political taxation bill, not a scientific taxation bill, and I believe that the burden which it imposes upon business is so great that it means a continuation of business paralysis.

I take this position because if I were not to do so I should be recreant to the trust imposed upon me by the great industrial State which honored me by electing me to this body, a State whose people have a spirit of neighborliness and whose wage earners and employers work together and exchange views to the end of the attainment of a common prosperity. I take this position because it squares with the Republican platform of last year, which declared that—sound policy equally demands the early accomplishment of that real reduction of the tax burden which may be achieved by substituting simple for complex tax laws and procedure, prompt and certain determination of the tax liability for delay and uncertainty, taxes which do not for taxes which do excessively mulct the consumer or needlessly repress enterprise and thrift.

I take this position because it is that of the leader of the Republican Party, the man pronounced by the titular head of the Democratic Party in the Senate to be the greatest man in the country, President Harding. In his address at the opening of the special session, upon the very subject we have under consideration, he said that—the most substantial relief from the tax burden must come for the present from the readjustment of internal taxes, and the revision and repeal of those taxes which have become unproductive and are so artificial and burdensome as to defeat their own purpose. A prompt and through-going revision of the internal tax laws, made with due regard to the protection of the revenues, is, in my judgment, a requisite to the revival of business activity in this country. * * * We are committed to the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the abolition of inequities and unjustifiable exasperations in the present system.

The senior Senator from Alabama, as Democratic leader, does not hesitate to say that he will vote against this revenue bill in any event, but the other day he freely admitted that—there is a limit beyond which you can not put the tax on wealth without destroying industry. There is a limit beyond which you can not put the tax on wealth without confiscation and through taxation, adopting the principles of socialism and the distribution of the assets of the country.

In harmony with the platform of the Republican Party, with the declaration of the great President it gave the country, and with the common-sense admission of the leader of the minority, the majority in the House of Representatives and in the Finance Committee of the Senate favored a measure reducing to 32 per cent the surtaxes on incomes. This reduction was proposed in order that further impetus and initiative might be given to business and that the return of good times might be accelerated.

But this revision, so necessary and beneficial to all the people and not merely to the rich, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] would have us believe, were met with stern objections on the part of the Democratic Members of this body and of a so-called "agricultural bloc." In an unfair appeal they have declared to the country, through the medium of this debate, that such reduction removes the burden from the rich and places it upon the poor. They have let it be known that as the only genuine friends of the people in this body they will protect them from such an outrage. With a congressional election in the offing and a realization on their part that the people reward their most loyal servants, they beat their manly breasts and point with pride to the fact that at last the country is safe from the effort of the wealthy to escape the duty of giving up the greater part of their incomes to support the Government that made their success possible. Lincoln said that God must have loved the common people because he made so many of them. Some of those here would have us believe that God hates the rich because he made so few of them. Anyway, there are more poor than rich voters on election day, and it seems to be much more profitable from a political point of view to tell the poor who are already heavily taxed to support a great war waged to protect the Nation's honor that the burden of that war should be borne by the rich. The inference is frequently made that all the rich are profiteers, which makes the argument seem all the more politically profitable.

This is not the first time that a demagogic appeal has been made by the Democratic Party. Apparently its sole hope of victory lies in such an appeal. The country has not forgotten its slogan of "Thank God, he kept us out of war." There was no sincerity in it, but it was clever, and foisted the Wilson administration upon us a second time. In 1910 the party captured Congress upon the declaration that it would bring the cost of living down to within reach of the market basket of the average housewife. It declared that the protective tariff and the reactionaries in Congress, the tools of the big interests, were alone responsible for soaring prices and that it would redeem its pledge to reduce them. Time went on and under its administration of the Government prices doubled. But that made no difficulty. Buncombe paid. It was not so long before that that the Democratic Party, headed by Bryan, stood unreservedly for fiat money and the repudiation of the credit of the Nation. It did so on the ground that in that way only could the grip of the money power upon the country be broken. And in the previous generation it had espoused the cause of greenbackism. So now we see the Democrats in this Chamber presenting views in accord with the traditions of their party in the past. Soak the rich and promise relief to the poor, no matter how impossible of realization it may be, and the buncombe thus cast upon the waters will return on election day. That is their maxim.

Excess-profits taxes have penalized the energetic and able business men, have caused the paying out of profits which should have been retained in business as capital to properly carry on the business, to meet the necessary extensions to plants and other such purposes and made necessary to get money for such purposes by excessive borrowings from banks and financial institutions. If the money that was paid out in excessive profits had been allowed to remain in the concerns conducting business much of the excess borrowing that took place in the last year or two would not have occurred and a good deal of the drastic liquidation of which we hear so much would have been avoided. Excessive surtaxes are unfair.

In repealing the excess-profits tax and substituting therefor a flat 15 per cent tax upon the net income of corporations the effect of this amendment is to increase the tax upon the majority of public utilities and corporations making less than 8 per cent upon their investment. It seems to me that the additional 5 per cent corporation income tax in the case of corporations of this kind imposes very heavy tax burdens upon these classes of corporations.

I feel that the surtax rates originally proposed by the committee were the maximum rates that should have been imposed and that the rates agreed to a few days ago are too high to stimulate sales and profit taking and to make possible transactions now blocked by the excessive surtax rates. I think that the surtax rates already agreed to will still tend to force the investment of capital in tax-free securities and to encourage taxpayers to avoid the income tax through the division of their income and to refrain from profitable sales or to place their capital in investments which promise a substantial yield for the future but which will yield little or no immediate return.

The report of the Committee on Finance shows that the number of returns of income over $300,000 fell from 1,296 in 1916 to 679 in 1919, and that the net income reported by these taxpayers fell from $993,000,000 in 1916 to $440,000,000 in 1919. This table also shows that the taxable income of these taxpayers from dividends, interest, and investment fell during the same period from $707,000,000 to $315,000,000.

I am informed that in the case of persons having incomes in excess of $66,000 the 32 per cent maximum surtax rate upon such income plus the 8 per cent normal tax is a tax of 40 per cent upon the amount of the incomes in excess of $66,000. In the case of such taxpayers having investments that yield 8 per cent a 40 per cent tax is equivalent to 3.2 per cent, which would leave the taxpayer 4.8 per cent net. It is clear, therefore, that even the 32 per cent maximum rate proposed in the amendment originally presented by the committee would leave a 5 per cent tax-free obligation in a preferential status to an obligation yielding 8 per cent or less. It seems to me that the higher rates agreed to by the committee will still tend to force taxpayers having large incomes to invest their money in tax-free obligations and in investments which promise substantial yield for the future, but which will yield little or no immediate return, thereby still tending to take capital out of regular investment channels.

One prominent manufacturer has written me as follows:

The old high rates will have to be paid on this year's business during the next year; and as I wrote you before, since very few are in a position to set up reserves for taxes, the tax on this year's business will have to be paid by most people out of next year's income. In the same way, the taxes on next year's business, at the excessive new rates proposed, will be payable in 1923 out of the earnings or income of that year. It is easy to see that with declining business and smaller profits this exorbitant taxation always hanging over from the year before will be very serious and in many cases may well be ruinous.

The tax burden fell very heavily on those who by their own ability and energy have been earning a good income, on which they had to pay the high surtaxes, and on which they will continue to pay such high taxes according to the present Senate proposals. On the other hand, people whose income came from investments, no matter how large that income is, could escape all the tax by putting their money into tax-free securities.

The seriousness of this situation is all the more apparent in times of depression like the present, when the man who tries to keep and succeeds in keeping his business running in face of all kinds of obstacles, takes the risk of loss, and so on, thus giving employment to the workpeople and business to other concerns from whom he draws materials, supplies, etc., when this man is heavily penalized for his enterprise and courage; while another man who seeks safety and ease for himself by placing his money in tax-exempt securities at 5 per cent and over pays no tax whatever. When such a situation is coldly stated and considered, it is unbelievable that any body of legislators could approve or acquiesce in such an obviously unjust and inequitable proposition.

I do not represent the opposition to wealth any more than I represent wealth. I took an oath when I came here to promote the general welfare. Capital is only accrued earnings and not that bugaboo which is so frequently conjured up for political purposes to show that it is exploiting all those who do not possess it. In a sense our reservoir of capital is the sum total of all the thrift and energy and stability which have made our land the greatest of all time. Our surplus of capital is that which gives impetus and intrepidity to new enterprise and sustains old ones in periods of stress. Industry can not do without this surplus any more than the representatives of the agricultural bloc thought the farmers could do without an extension of a billion dollars of the earnings of capital of the people as a whole through their Government to finance new markets for agricultural products in Europe. Our commerce can do without it no more than could the southern planters when they placarded Wall Street with the cry "Buy a bale of cotton!" Our great enterprise can do without it no more than the miner and small business man who seeks it for improvement. On capital, on accrued earnings, all our system of credit is builded. Civilization is expressed not merely in the school room and the book but in the telephone and the electric light, in the steam engine, the steel rail and the trolley; in the ocean liner, the automobile, and the airplane; in the farm tractor, the cotton gin, and the sewing machine; and, if you please, in the cash register. Capital, or accrued earnings, combined with the inventive and creative genius made possible by the liberty of America, has enabled us to subdue a wilderness and people a continent, to feed and clothe a world, to wrest from field and factory and mine a greater wealth than was accredited to the combined British and German Empires at the beginning of the war, and to stand forth as the great servant of humanity.

Our wealthy men who have given us our capital for large extensions of industry have arisen from obscurity and out of the luxuriant possibilities of our institutions have organized and directed achievement which has made one of the most romantic pages in the history of man and has excited the emulation if not the envy of the world. Rockefeller began life as a bookkeeper and Carnegie as a telegraph operator. James J. Hill was a steamboat clerk. The original John Jacob Astor was a butcher. Vanderbilt at 16 began life by carrying passengers in a sailboat from Staten Island to New York. Marshall Field began as a clerk in a country store. Edison, Ford, and Schwab started with nothing but their own native abilities. Men like Adolph Ochs and Frank Munsey, who control two of our greatest newspapers, combined initiative with skill and character with capital, and were enabled to serve us all. All capital and genius can do is to serve us and help us to make life livable and to make America the first Nation in the world. Combine initiative and character and capital together and you have all that we are.

Yet here on this floor it is proposed that the mightiest commercial and industrial possibility our earth has known shall be penalized until the magic spring of initiative which propels it shall refuse to work. American genius and energy as expressed in American business are not content with little results. They are prepared to embark in new enterprise if they are not made to feel that the reward of their toil and intrepidity are to be taken from them. There is a point at which initiative to the expenditure of capital in the extension of new enterprise ceases. That point may be forced by too heavy taxation of capital. It is at that point that we may overturn the theory and tradition of our institutions and become socialistic. Socialism is the joint ownership and use of the means of production and distribution. The Socialist proposes to level the capitalist, whom he regards as an exploiter of labor, to the level of all and then let all harness his genius for good of all. He forgets that capital can not be used without giving employment to labor. He forgets that the man with $2,000 in the bank is a capitalist just as is the man who has $2,000,000 in accrued earnings to his credit. His theory appeals to the uninformed just as does the demagogic appeal against wealth made on this floor; but when you consider this proposed destruction of individuality, when you realize that it can only harness already established enterprises and can not succeed in new ones because it removes the initiative which propels them, you find that his theory is not worthy the time and thought of practical men.

Mr. President, I have here on my desk numerous letters from business men and corporations in my State. They are not profiteers. Their corporations are not corporations of large capital or business enterprises of great magnitude. They are old established merchants and manufacturers in the State, because New Jersey is an industrial State, a large industrial State, and for many years has been so. These old established institutions, prosperous, yet conservative in their business methods, the very best class of industries we have in the State, have almost universally expressed themselves, through their chambers of commerce and boards of trade, against the burdens and the persecution, I may say, of this system of taxation. These enterprises feel that under the plan proposed of extensive surtaxes and the high corporation taxes they can not live. More certainly that is true with the 15 per cent corporation tax on the public utilities. They are practically going to be put on the wrong side of the ledger with this tax.

Almost universally have come to me from my State, from those corporations who are not profiteers, who are not men of great wealth, protests against this burden of taxation and a demand universally that we adopt a more general and uniform system of sales tax. They complain of the intricacies of this tax. They were promised by both parties that they should have a simple tax. It was said by Commissioner Roper that it cost $25,000,000 to collect the tax of 1918, and he estimated that $100,000,000 was spent by the payers of that tax in employing lawyers and experts to show them how to make up their returns.

I submit, representing that great industrial State, hoping that a more moderate revision of the tax will come and that this body will see the force of the great sentiment of the East for a sales tax, that the Senate should adopt the Smoot provisions when they are presented to it and lift that load off of the business of the country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to yield to my friend the Senator from Missouri when I finish, if I may be permitted to ask him to wait.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator before he sits down give us the names of those corporations which have protested and are going to be destroyed by this bill, and then tell us the amount of their excess profits during the war and since, and also give us the names of the individuals who have incomes of over $68,000 who are going to be oppressed by paying an income tax on the amount above $68,000?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hold in my hand a number of letters from those corporations and from chambers of commerce and from business associations, which the Senator from Missouri is at liberty to examine and investigate. They are from men of character, men of business reputation and stability, and I do not question their word. I have made no statistical investigation of their statements. All I know is that the chambers of commerce and the boards of trade have investigated the situation, and the men, I believe, will be perfectly willing to submit to the inspection and investigation of any expert in regard to their statements. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I can furnish him with several hundred, I believe a thousand more such letters.

Mr. REED. Yes; I think the Senator can. I think everybody who has to pay a tax of any kind has protested except the ordinary common man.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Oh, no, Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Missouri that the men who are paying taxes are not patriotic and do not realize at the present time that we are paying for the war, and that we have to be patriotic and bear this burden of taxation. But I do say that to impose such a great burden on business at this time is fundamentally unsound and that some effort should be made to relieve it in order that we may have a revival of business. The business interests of New Jersey to-day are paralyzed to a large extent and they want relief from taxation.

It is my contention, therefore, that when it is proposed to place a surtax on large incomes of 68 per cent in time of peace, as originally suggested by the agricultural bloc, we so harass capital that it will not enter upon the task of restoring American business. It is my belief, also, that when we place a surtax on large incomes of 50 per cent, which, with the ordinary tax, amounts to 58 per cent, we bring about the very same deadening effect. During a great war when the very existence of the Nation is at stake any extremity of taxation may be resorted to and the very wealthy, with a patriotism no less than that of the less fortunate, must submit to even confiscation if necessary. But the war is over and now we must set ourselves to the task of reviving industry. It was in order that we might do so that we were called into extraordinary session by the President. It was in order that we might do so that the House has framed and we are about to pass a tariff which will protect American enterprise. It was in order that we might do so that we began consideration of this revenue bill. But by taxing large incomes 58 per cent we are nullifying any intention of restoring business in revising our system of taxation.

I believe the burden of taxation should be proportionately distributed. No one here will contend, I think, that the man of small income should give to the Government 58 per cent of it. If the experiment were tried the average man might be able to exist, but his purchasing power would be so diminished that our very civilization as expressed in our creature comforts would suffer. A universal protest from Maine to California would be heard. Then why tax the man with large income 58 per cent of the reward of his skill? Because he is better able to bear it, some will contend. Conceding that he is more able than the poor man to bear it, there is a point at which the interest of the community in his capital steps in. If the rate is too high, the community takes it from him and merely turns it into frozen capital, which is gradually expended for the Army and Navy and the general expense of the Government. If the tax is not too high, and from this point of view we ought to concede that one-third of the income is enough, his surplus is given to new enterprise and the entire industrial fabric is given new vitality.

If the relation of the Government to the pockets and the business of the people can be placed upon a healthful and stimulative basis, this country, with all of its wealth and energy and genius, will take the lead in the greatest commercial and industrial revival ever known. We have passed through a period of severe liquidation. The more severe the liquidation the more certain we shall be of recuperation. The Great War has brought the world in closer touch. In the marshaling of world resources for the sustenance of the fighting forces against the German and Austrian Empires we have learned more of these resources and their uses to man. The golden wealth of Mexico has hardly been touched. Canada is a wilderness as compared with its possibilities. Due to the Democratic tariff, we have had no protecting wall which would permit our enterprise to grow. Democratic extravagance and waste have wrought havoc in the Public Treasury. But with sane and economical administration and proper encouragement to industry we shall be assured that American genius will combine with American capital to bring a far greater prosperity than that which followed the Cleveland administration in McKinley's time.

Some of those of the Democratic Party and the agricultural bloc who seek to stifle capital, and therefore to cripple enterprise, may find favor in States which have been affected by years of muckraking, followed by two administrations of pitiful Democratic experiment. I remind them that in the past as able men as they sought to please misguided constituencies in the face of reason and found defeat in an awakened common sense. I need refer only to the late Senator Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, who left the Republican convention with tears in his eyes and repented in sackcloth and ashes. Demagogism always meets with eventual awakening. The judgment of the people as a whole needs only to be given all of the facts in order to sustain right reason. And I know that when the appeal to cripple the capitalistic stores, which are the basis of development of new industry, is made to them with demagogic intent they will listen for a while, but when they are better informed they will resent any intent to establish socialism in this country in the name of taxation of the business men they indiscriminately designate as the capitalistic exploiter and profiteer. I feel that the people will sustain those in this Chamber who vote, in the words of President Harding, for "the abolition of inequities and unjustifiable exasperations in the present system."

For the same reason that I would not harass American industry and New Jersey enterprise to the point of inaction I would not place a tax of more than 10 per cent upon corporation profits. The fact that there are 600,000 holders of our railway stocks and bonds alone ought to convince us that the capitalistic class in this country is not a small one and that the way ought to be made inviting for extensions of enterprise. A tax of 15 per cent is, in my opinion, altogether too high.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand the Senator from New Jersey to object, as I do, to the flat tax of 15 per cent upon the net income of corporations which is provided in this bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the Senator feels, as I do, that the tax upon the net income of corporations should not be in excess of 10 per cent. Does the Senator realize that the amendment proposed by me provides for a reduction to less than 15 per cent in the case of 190,000 of the 200,000 corporations of the country which make a net income?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator, therefore, state whether or not he is going to support my amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Because the Senator has not stated the whole of the amendment. I most certainly am opposed to the increase of the corporation tax to 15 per cent on incomes of from $100,000 to $300,000 and 20 per cent on incomes over $300,000 as being excessive, oppressive, and unfair.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from New Jersey appreciate the fact that corporations which have incomes of between $100,000 and $300,000 would get the benefit of the tax of 10 per cent upon the first $100,000 of their income and only pay a 15 per cent tax upon the amount between $100,000 and $300,000, and therefore they would all pay a less tax rate than that which is provided for in the committee amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How about corporations having an income of over $300,000?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are between 3,000 and 5,000 corporations having an income of over $300,000 which would have their tax increased, not to 20 per cent, however, because they would get the benefit of the 10 per cent rate on the first $100,000 and of the 15 per cent rate on the income between $100,000 and $300,000. So that probably the rate of taxation they would pay would be from 17 to 18 per cent if it were fixed as a flat tax.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Suppose a corporation which, according to the calculations of the Senator from Massachusetts, is to pay something like 18 per cent on its net income had made in the way of income only about 4 per cent on its invested capital, could it afford to pay the tax proposed by the Senator?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But that is what the Senator's amendment would have such corporations do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the same objection applies to the committee amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it does.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. While the injustice which the Senator points out applies to that small number of corporations which would be receiving a net income in excess of $300,000, my amendment does what the committee amendment does not—it lessens the tax upon the 190,000 corporations which have made less than a 10 per cent return.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true. I understand that; but still the amendment in its entirety would inflict a terrific injustice. I am not, however, defending the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree with the Senator from New York that both amendments create injustice; but the committee amendment creates an injustice to 50 per cent of the corporations of the country, while my amendment creates an injustice to but something less than 5 per cent of the number of corporations because of the smaller number of corporations embraced within the bracket of those having a net income in excess of $300,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But may I not suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he is counting corporations as entities and tabulating them as if they were individuals? It so happens, as I think the Senator will admit, that some corporations, for example a railroad corporation, should not be considered as one entity. It includes hundreds of thousands of stockholders.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is very true. Of course, corporations are groups of individuals.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is why I think there is merit in my amendment, for it applies to corporations, made up of groups of individuals, the same principle as that applied in the case of the income tax, namely, ability to pay. The more the individual receives in the way of income the higher the tax should be; so with a corporation, the greater the income the corporation receives the higher taxes it should pay. However, I am afraid we are taking up the time of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], whom I want to thank for yielding to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not quite follow that course of logic on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. I think the earnings of a corporation can not be put in the same classification as the income of an individual and be taxed in the same manner.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree with the Senator that they can not. They can not because of the mismanagement and the basic evils in the organization and control of corporations. There is no reason, however, why as to a group of individuals the classification should not be the same. They, in fact, organize for the purpose of doing business at a less expense and with the hope of securing greater income than if they operate in business individually; and if a corporation were properly organized and properly regulated, the same relation of income and investment would apply to corporations as to individuals.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not entirely certain of that; in any event, a tax law can not cure incompetency.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; but the committee amendment seeks to increase the tax burdens upon the most competent and the most honest business corporations in the country. The Senator from New York is aware of that fact. That is why the Senator from New Jersey objects to the increase in the rate of taxation from 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object to the principle of both the committee amendment and the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thought probably that the Senator would, but the Senator will have to make a choice, and I hope upon reflection he will find a little bit more merit in my amendment than in the committee amendment. I agree with the Senator that both of them are founded upon false fundamental principles.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I favor limiting the tax on the corporations to 10 per cent; beyond that I am unwilling to go; and I believe the graduated increase tax proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts would simply place a greater burden on the business interests of the country.

The sales tax, which I indorse as the surest way out of our revenue difficulties, is not an attempt to remove the burden of supporting the Government by means of repeal of the excess-profits and high surtaxes from the rich and then place it upon the shoulders of the consuming public by a tax on all they purchase. It is only an attempt to make more simple and collectible a system which has become a burden to the average taxpayer. The excess-profits and surtaxes have been passed on from price to price in an ascending scale which has not contributed to the decline of the high cost of living. The high surtaxes have occasioned a diminishing return upon investment of capital in new enterprise, upon industry in general, and therefore upon the purchasing power of the wage earner, 5,000,000 of whom are to-day without work. By a sales tax enough revenue might be raised to make up for the loss of taxes which now hamper business and stand in the way of prosperity and others which have become a nuisance to the people. And if expenditures continue to be cut down under the budget system, the reorganization of the Government bureaus, and the elimination of surviving Democratic methods, such as the Shipping Board is trying to work out, we shall be able to raise enough through this sales tax to pay off each year the billion dollars of certificates of indebtedness instead of borrowing a billion at 6 per cent to pay off a billion at 4½ per cent.

I appeal to Senators on both sides of the Chamber to cast aside mere political consideration and to seek in common sense and an equitable readjustment of the tax burden the means to the stimulation of American initiative and industry and the attainment of a common prosperity greater than we have hitherto known in the United States.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish to consume just a few minutes of the time of the Senate. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] speaks about the return of prosperity. I shall hail with delight the return of the prosperity which we experienced under President Wilson before the Republicans came into power and locked the wheels of Government in 1918 by controlling the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. President, a special dispatch from New York, in the Washington Post of yesterday, tells us that the cotton price broke because of pressure from Wall Street. Cotton ought to be advancing in price every day. I have stated here time and again that the farmer lost money upon his cotton crop last year, and is losing money upon his cotton crop this year. I want briefly to give some facts to the Senate and the country.

The farmer who was paid an average price of 12 cents a pound, or $60 a bale, for 10 bales of cotton in 1920, received for his crop $600. That was 18 cents a pound, or $90 a bale, under the cost of production. So the cotton farmer lost $900 on his 10-bale crop last year. This year on account of the boll weevil and other causes the same farmer produces 5 bales. At the present price of 18 cents a pound, or $90 a bale, he will receive $450 for his crop. So he lacks $450 of receiving for his entire crop this year as much as he lost on his crop last year. His 5-bale crop this year cost him 25 cents a pound to produce it, and if he is forced to sell at the present price he will lose 7 cents a pound, or $35 a bale, which is a total loss of $175 on his 5-bale crop this year. The price that he received last year and the price obtaining to-day would make this one farmer's loss on his last two crops $1,075. This loss is in the form of indebtedness which will hang over the farmer when he plants another crop.

Will the Republican Party permit conditions to exist that rob the cotton producer of the fruits of his toil and that will drive the farmer entirely away from cotton production next year? The cotton farmer must receive a better price for cotton or he must quit producing it.

Mr. President, large cotton acreage reduction, the small amount of fertilizers used, and the ravages of the boll weevil have been the cause of producing the smallest American cotton crop in a quarter of a century. The crop is made and nearly all of it has been gathered. We have consumed in the United States since August 1, 1920, 6,328,000 bales of cotton. This amount is just 209,000 bales less than the whole crop this year will be. The Government's estimate fixes the crop this year at 6,537,000 bales. We have exported since August 1, 1920, 7,252,000 bales. This is 715,000 bales more than the entire American cotton crop will be this year.

We have consumed and exported to date 13,580,000 bales of cotton. This amount is twice as much and 500,000 bales more than twice as much as the entire crop this year will be. And yet, with these astounding facts before us, we see cotton selling to-day way below the cost of production.

In view of the facts that I have here presented, I make bold to declare that cotton ought now to be selling for at least 30 cents a pound. The demand for cotton is so great and the supply of cotton is so small that the price is bound to advance several cents a pound. It is now selling below the cost of production. The commissioner of agriculture of the State of Texas informs me that it cost 25 cents a pound to produce this cotton crop. We are justified in holding cotton off the market until the price will cover the cost of production and yield to the producer a profit. It cost $125 a bale to produce this crop, and cotton is now selling for $90 a bale. This is $35 a bale below the cost of production. At the present price the cotton producers of the United States will lose on this year's crop of 6,537,000 bales, as estimated by the Government, $128,795,000. In the name of fair treatment and common justice to our cotton producers I call on them to hold their cotton for a better price.

Hon. W. H. Kettig, member of the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank Board, issued the following statement several days ago:

> There will be no necessity for the farmer dumping his crop on the market, as he can borrow 80 per cent of its value at a reasonable rate of interest for the next 12 months. The cotton farmer can place his cotton in bonded warehouses, take his certificates to his local bank, and borrow 80 per cent of their value. The Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta has just issued a circular to its member banks offering to rediscount this paper in unlimited amounts regardless of the line of credit already received by said banks. The same accommodation is offered the nonmember banks, who can discount through the members of the Federal reserve system.

Hon. Angus McLean, of the War Finance Board, has just informed me that the War Finance Corporation will make loans through local banks to individual farmers who wish to borrow money upon their cotton. I want every farmer who desires to hold his cotton for the advanced price, which is bound to come, to take advantage of the opportunities here offered to obtain the money necessary to keep his cotton off the market. I call upon him to refuse to sell a bale until the price covers the cost of production and yields him a profit. By all the rules of right and laws of justice he is entitled to receive such a price. If he will hold his cotton and refuse to sell a pound at the present price, he ought to receive, and I believe will receive, $50 more per bale than he is now receiving for cotton.

I want every cotton farmer in Alabama who applies for a loan, either to the Federal reserve banks or to the War Finance Corporation, if he fails to obtain it to write to me, giving me all the facts in the case. The Federal reserve banking system and the War Finance Corporation as now operated were both created for the purpose of helping the producers of agricultural products at a time like this. If this aid is now refused to the cotton farmers, I want to know it, and I will bring it to the floor of the Senate and let the Congress and the country know how financial aid is being withheld from farmers whose product is selling below the cost of production.

Mr. President, Walter B. Brown, editor of the New York Commercial, said a few days ago that the course of the cotton market from now on would be upward. He said, in support of his position, that—

> On the present decreased estimates of the United States Government a shortage of fully 3,000,000 bales below world requirements is a conservative figure.

David C. Harrower, cotton expert of the Wall Street Journal, who has just finished a tour of the cotton-growing States, said the other day that the Government had in August estimated the cotton crop at 7,035,000 bales, but that on account of the damage done by the boll weevil and unfavorable weather it was safe to say that we would not produce more than 6,500,000 bales.

On yesterday, Mr. President, the American Cotton Association, in convention assembled at Birmingham, estimated the crop at 6,447,000 bales.

Deterioration in the cotton crop has been very rapid and very decisive since August 25, and scores of well-informed cotton men in the cotton States express the opinion that about 6,000,000 bales will be all that will be produced this year.

We are consuming more cotton month by month, and we are exporting more cotton month by month than has been the case for several months in the past.

Mr. President, in conclusion I want to say that when the farmer produces a big cotton crop he is confronted with low prices in the market and he is told that the reason for that is that we have a large crop, more than is required to meet the demand. I submit to this body and to the country that when he makes a small crop and comes into the market place with a supply smaller than the amount required to meet the demand, under the same logic and market rules he is entitled to receive a high price because the crop is small. I want to say here now, before I take my seat, that we have not produced enough cotton this year to supply American spindles and the spindles of Great Britain, to say nothing of France and Italy and Japan and China and Germany and other countries that consume American cotton.

The Bible tells us that the man who will not provide for his own family is worse than an infidel. I propose to join the army of those called upon by the president of the American Cotton Association to tour the cotton belt in the interest of a hard-and-fast cotton-holding movement. The one-horse farmer who lost $900 on his crop last year and $175 on half a crop this year is entitled to tie up the market and refuse to sell until the price will cover the cost of production plus a profit. I call upon these people, whose boys went abroad and fought and some of them died to save the civilization of this country, to fight the bear speculators of Wall Street, to fight all those who are robbing them of a fair price on their cotton. They are the masters of the situation. They have it in their power to control it. If they will tie up the market and refuse to sell, cotton will advance from $50 to $75 a bale inside of 90 days.

They are selling cotton now under the cost of production. Nobody who is fair and just will demand that a man sell a thing when he has to sell it for less than it cost him to produce it. Nobody will deny him the right to add a little profit to the cost of production. That is all we are doing, Senators; and I call upon those in authority to help the farmers of the South, who were robbed last year of hundreds of millions of dollars and who are being robbed now of $35 on every bale of cotton that is forced upon the market.

At the rate the United States cotton mills are now consuming cotton we will consume here at home in the next 10 months and by the time another crop comes upon the market 5,000,000 bales of American cotton. This would leave only 1,500,000 bales of this crop to go to foreign countries, where more than 7,000,000 bales have been required to supply the demand since August 1 last year.

This situation discloses the fact that we are face to face with a cotton famine. Surely the man who has cotton to-day is entitled to receive the price justified by the law of supply and demand. The very small supply of American cotton puts the producer in position to demand such a price, a price that will yield a fair profit.

I call upon the farmers to unite their forces and hold for an advance in the price of cotton. I call upon farmers, merchants, and bankers to stand together and compel a fair price to be paid for cotton. I call upon them to stand together in unity of purpose and concerted action in accomplishing this thing. We have a right to demand a price that will yield a profit, and if we will stand together we can enforce our demand.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. PHIPPS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. NICHOLSON] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. On the pending amendment to the amendment of the committee I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in reference to this amendment, which does not solve the problem as all of us would like to have it solved. It would leave an unequal burden upon the manufacturers of the United States, and does not necessarily reach the people who are making the largest returns upon their real investments. I have been hopeful that some one would present a solution of this problem which would be satisfactory to all of us who are anxious for just taxation.

I do not believe any such solution has been presented. However, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, because I think it is the best plan proposed—and, anyway, this matter ought to go into conference. There ought to be an opportunity for another effort to solve this question properly.

I expect to say something about the bill later, but I wanted to say this now, just prior to the vote that is to be taken. I am not supporting the amendment because I think it is a perfect solution, because I do not; still, I believe, as I said, that it at least furnishes an opportunity to present the matter in conference as it ought to be presented, and I would dislike very much to have it go to conference without such an opportunity.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to say that I am entirely in accord with what the Senator has said. I believe an amendment can be proposed that will put this matter in conference, and at the same time will not compel the corporation earning less than 8 per cent, and one that has never paid any excess-profits tax, to pay the increase which so many of the small corporations have to pay.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is such a proposition prepared now and before the Senate?

Mr. LENROOT. One has been hastily prepared. I would not like to say that it is in its final form, but some whom I have consulted think this would cover the case:

Provided, That no corporation whose net income is less than 8 per cent of its invested capital, and which paid no excess-profits tax under the provisions of the revenue act of 1918, shall pay a greater tax under the provisions of this section than the per cent of its net income.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator is getting right back to the excess-profits idea, which we have been trying to abandon. This matter of parading an amendment until it gets into conference is very misleading and is hardly fair to the public. Amendments are supposed to be offered in good faith, on their intrinsic merit, and with the purposes of pressing them to adoption to the best of the conferees' ability. To parade an amendment and let it have a little fresh air is an unusual parliamentary procedure on an important question in a revenue bill. It might be tolerated in the case of some minor amendment concerning baseball bats or some little tax, but hardly in the case of one of the salient features of the bill. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be voted down and that the Senate will not permit itself to flounder back into the mesh of the excess-profits tax proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. PENROSE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he was through.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was very glad to yield to the Senator.

I had not believed that the Senator from Massachusetts offered his amendment simply for the purpose of airing it nor am I supporting it on that theory. I do believe that it is better than any proposition on the subject which has been submitted, and for that reason I shall vote for it. If a better one is submitted, I shall very gladly support that; but this is a present duty, which comes to me now, and I regard the Senator's amendment, as I said, better than the provision of the committee, so that I can not escape the responsibility which rests upon me to vote for it when it is before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to state to the Senator from Wisconsin that the amendment to my amendment suggested by him is acceptable.

Mr. LENROOT. This was not an amendment to the Senator's amendment; it was more in the nature of a substitute for it, because I think it would cure the major injustice of the present committee amendment, which would increase the taxes upon small corporations which have never made as much as 8 per cent, and that is one thing the Senator desires to avoid through the adoption of his amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. BORAH. That is only one of the things he covers, is it not?

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is correct.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think this matter should be in such shape that it will get into conference, where the conferees will have jurisdiction to adjust this matter of the tax between 10 per cent and some higher figure; but if the committee amendment be adopted there will be no such opportunity; there will be a difference only between 12½ per cent and 15 per cent, the House proposition being 12½ and the Senate 15, and it would not be possible for the conferees to give relief to any corporation against any increase of tax.

I shall offer my amendment when the opportunity presents itself; but in view of the statement made, while I think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does an injustice to a large corporation having a large number of stockholders, honestly capitalized, and earning only 3 or 4 per cent, at the same time I appreciate that it does justice to the small corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Which are very much more numerous.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; but it seems to me that we should endeavor to do justice to all of them, as far as possible.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. While my amendment does an injustice to a small group of corporations, the committee amendment does an injustice to nearly every corporation.

Mr. LENROOT. As I calculate the return the Government would receive under the Senator's amendment, a corporation with an income of $100,000, having less than 8 per cent earnings, would pay no increase in taxes, but would pay the same taxes it pays now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is a fact.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the principal reason why the Senator desires to offer this amendment, or something similar, is that it will afford an opportunity to bring out of the conference an entirely different proposition. When the House passed a bill containing a proposition which carried 10 per cent and the Senate amends it so as to carry 15 per cent, does not that amendment open up the whole subject?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would the conferees be restricted to dividing between 15 per cent and 10 per cent, fixing upon some figure between those, or could they substitute another method between those two?

Mr. LENROOT. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that the House passed a bill carrying a proposition for 10 per cent. The House proposition was 12½ per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us say 12½. I simply gave that as an illustration.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the rules of both Houses the conferees would not be permitted to go below 12½ or above 15.

Mr. McCUMBER. Could they not divide it into brackets?

Mr. LENROOT. Between 12½ and 15 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Could they not say that some brackets might even be above 15?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely not; I am certain about it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they can not do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not certain about that.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, a corporation with a net income of $100,000, and earning less than 8 per cent this year, would pay the same amount under the Senator's amendment as it does under the present law. A corporation with an income of $200,000, earning so little that they are paying no excess-profits tax now, would pay a tax of 12½ per cent under the Senator's amendment as against 15 under the amendment proposed by the committee. If the net income was $300,000, under the Senator's amendment the corporation would pay 13½ per cent, as against 15 per cent under the amendment proposed by the committee. It is not until the income of $400,000 is reached that the tax under the Senator's amendment would equal the tax which would be imposed by the committee, and on all incomes in excess of $400,000 the Senator's amendment would impose a greater tax than is proposed by the committee.

We all see that there is a possibility of as great an injustice to the corporation that has a large net income as to the corporation with a small income. But, Mr. President, it seems to me this must get into conference in some way, so that we can prevent the increase of taxes upon corporations that have never made any money, or made only 3 or 4 per cent. I know of no other way, in view of the uncertainties of the situation, as presented by the chairman of the committee, who is opposed to the suggestion I have made, than for me to vote for this amendment, in order that we may get it into conference, in the hope that some plan can be devised which will do justice both to the large corporations and to the small ones.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the great injustice of the present arrangement and of all the arrangements which have been offered, to my mind does not rest upon whether the corporations are small or great; it rests on the fact that we are giving relief from the excess-profits tax to large corporations which pay excess-profits taxes, and we are giving no relief whatever to corporations which never have paid an excess-profits tax, and never earned an excess profit. Not only are we giving them no relief but we are adding 50 per cent to their taxes, and that seems to me to be extremely unjust.

I have prepared an amendment covering only one class of corporations of that sort, real estate corporations, which are very common in the large cities of the East, and I think everywhere, who are engaged in building great office buildings and structures of that kind, who divide, as a rule, about 5 per cent and pay very heavy local taxes. They have never paid excess-profits taxes, and they would get no relief from the removal of that tax. On the contrary, they are to be burdened with 12½ per cent additional, or 15 per cent additional, and it seems to me that is an injustice which ought to be met in some way.

What I have proposed reaches only one class of corporations, but I think it would be better if we could in some way leave the door open, as suggested by the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, so that the matter can be discussed thoroughly in conference.

Mr. LENROOT. It could be helped if I could get unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment could be offered in the Senate beyond a doubt.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I stated that I would support the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], with the understanding that if an opportunity offered I would present the amendment I propose, and if that should be adopted I would later vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. But the amendment offered by my colleague seems to me simply to continue, in a slightly modified form, the gross injustices which now exist.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I heard what the Senator stated with respect to real estate corporations in the city of Boston, and my understanding is, as the Senator has said, that they have been corporations of rather small or modest earning capacity.

Mr. LODGE. They make very small earnings.

Mr. POMERENE. I am in sympathy with the proposition, but why distinguish between them and other corporations with similar earning capacity? It seems to me if the amendment could be formulated to take care of one of the classes of corporations that it could be so modified as to make it general in its character and apply to all the corporations with a modest earning capacity.

Mr. LODGE. I said, or meant to say, that the objection to the amendment which I was proposing is that it relates only to one class.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. LODGE. But it is rather a glaring case, because the Senator realizes that the real estate corporations have a very heavy burden of local taxation.

Mr. POMERENE. Ordinarily that is true.

Mr. LODGE. It is heavier than many others. I have a list here of some of them in Boston, and I notice that there are only one or two which paid as high as 7 per cent profit. Most of the dividends declared have been about 5 per cent. That, I think, applies to the great majority of them.

I think there is an inescapable injustice there, and I do not say it on the ground that one is large and the other small, but we are relieving by the bill a great number of corporations which have made great profits and we are adding to the taxes of corporations, great or small, which have made no excess profits at any time.

Now, one word more. The trouble with taking it into conference now is, as the Senator from Wisconsin points out, that the limitation within which the committee of conference can act is between 12½ and 15 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that objection would be overcome by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin if it be made a part of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, because his amendment provides a maximum of 20 per cent, so that there would then be ample leeway for the conference committee to reach a medium between the two.

Mr. LODGE. I objected to the 20 per cent. I think it is carried altogether too high in my colleague's amendment. I am not trying specially to tax wealth or to tax large corporations or to relieve poor corporations; I am trying to get a just tax which will fall on all corporations alike.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, my colleagues will understand the reason why I put in a rate of 20 per cent. It was to try to get the same amount of revenue that the committee bill calls for; otherwise I would have allowed a maximum of but 15 per cent. However, in order to get the same revenue or practically the same amount as sought by the committee amendment, I realized that I had to make a larger bracket than 15 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know just what the figures of the loss would be by such an amendment as is suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, but that would cover the purpose. I can not vote for my colleague's amendment as it stands, but I should be glad to vote for some general proposition which would take the question into conference and give an opportunity to afford relief to such corporations as I have described, who ought to have the same relief that other corporations have.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the glaring inconsistency of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts can perhaps be pointed out by calling attention to cases that apply to many corporations. Take a corporation with $100,000 capital. If they made 100 per cent profit they would only pay a 10 per cent tax under the Senator's amendment. A company with $200,000 capital making 50 per cent profit would likewise fall within the 10 per cent rate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I beg the Senator's pardon; the 15 per cent tax rate would apply then.

Mr. SMOOT. If they made a profit of 50 per cent, they would fall within the 10 per cent rate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I beg the Senator's pardon; the rate is 10 per cent where the net income does not exceed $100,000, 15 per cent where the net income is between $100,000 and $200,000, and where the net income is $300,000 and more the rate is 20 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I still think I am right, or else I did not understand what the Senator himself said. Is not an income of $100,000 or less to be taxed 10 per cent under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought I was right. If a corporation has a capital of $200,000 and earns 50 per cent, that would be $100,000 and would only be taxed 10 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The net income being $100,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, take an institution with $1,000,000 capital and only making 4½ per cent. They would then have to pay a 20 per cent tax. I can not see any reason why a concern making 100 per cent should pay one-half the rate of tax that a concern would pay which would earn only 4½ per cent on its capital.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator doubtless will recall that this proposition, according to my recollection, was submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], a member of the Finance Committee, and was very exhaustively considered and was acted upon adversely in the committee after a full deliberation of over half a day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the chairman if the minority members were present at that conference?

Mr. PENROSE. They were permitted to be present. Of course, they did not flock there like the majority members or show that zeal and enthusiasm. I am talking about the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The amendment exempting real estate?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And not the amendment offered by me?

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate, but it does seem to me there are hundreds of such cases, aye, thousands of them. I think there would be an injustice placed upon the corporation that makes a small rate of profit as against the corporation which makes a high rate of profit. Therefore I can not support the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I agree with all the Senator said, but what is the alternative? The corporation that makes only 1 per cent profit has its tax increased from 10 per cent to 15 per cent on its net income. The only difference between the committee amendment and my amendment is that whatever injustices are perpetrated by an increase in the rates which corporations have to pay in the future they are restricted to 5,000 in number, while the benefit which my amendment provides by lowering the rate proposed by the committee reaches 100,000 corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. The only alternative, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, would be——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The sales tax?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not have that in mind, but I thank the Senator for his suggestion, for it is a wise one. It would be to base it upon the rate of earnings as to capital, and as soon as we do that we get back into the question of capital stock and invested capital and reserve, just those things we are all trying to get rid of.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Every amendment using that standard has been defeated. We are now confronted with the alternative of the committee amendment or my amendment. The committee amendment increases the taxes of 100,000 business corporations. The Senator agrees to that?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Every corporation that does not make 8 per cent profit, while my amendment increases the taxes only upon 5,000 of the 100,000 corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator heard me speak the other day when I called particular attention to the fact that the tax of every corporation in the United States making less than 11.2 per cent was increased 50 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the other day the Senate by a decisive vote voted against retaining the excess-profits tax. Now, without considering whether we voted wisely or unwisely at that time, the Senate did vote against the excess-profits tax. It is now, within a day or two afterwards, proposed to reintroduce the principle of the excess-profits tax. That is what is in the amendment which is to be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

There were two reasons that actuated the committee, and I assume the same reasons actuated the Senate, in voting against the excess-profits tax. The argument has been that it discourages new enterprise and even discourages a great deal of zeal in the enterprise now in existence where they are liable to make more than 8 per cent. So we decide on that ground—national ground—on the ground that it was an incentive to business if we could get rid of the excess-profits tax. Now, that philosophy has been promulgated not alone by the Republican Party but by the Democratic Secretaries of the Treasury.

Well, we voted it down. Now, there was another reason why we voted that down, and that was that the large overcapitalized corporations were not paying any excess-profits tax and were not liable to pay any. Without knowing exactly what their profits were it was thought by a straight flat tax upon their profits, without respect to the capital invested, we would get from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 back from what we would lose in the excess-profits tax, or somewhere about that.

Then in order to get a tax out of the large corporations which would not be an excess-profits tax the committee reported in favor of a flat corporation tax on profits. Now, if we are to wipe that out we have to get the money somewhere else, and we have to get it by taxing other people somewhere else along the line, either new taxation or an increase in the old taxes. I believe on the whole that a better result would follow if we would have the straight flat tax.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin said that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is more just than the one brought in by the committee, and at the same time the Senator from Wisconsin suggests an amendment which would eliminate this tax applying, if I understand his statement, to corporations unless they earn more than 8 per cent. That gets us right back again to excess profits, and that gets us right back again to the proposition that we would get no taxes whatever from corporations that represent about 50 per cent of the entire corporate business in the United States.

But is it more just? The Senator said it is unjust to tax these corporations 10 per cent that earn less than 8 per cent, and that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would be less onerous. It is exactly the opposite of that. Take a corporation that has a capital invested of $100,000,000. One hundred thousand dollars return on that represents 1 mill. On that basis it would only make 1 mill, and if it had $200,000 return it would make 2 mills; if it had $300,000 it would make 3 mills. Then a big corporation, though they earned only 1 mill, would be taxed only 10 per cent. Under the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts if they earned 2 mills they would pay 15 per cent, and if they earned 3 mills they would pay 20 per cent. So that he has increased the tax upon those larger corporations which pay less than 8 per cent, if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Now, let us see how it would work out in a given instance. Here is a widow, perhaps, who has bought some of this stock so as to have a steady income. She invests $5,000 in it. If she got 3 mills she would receive $15, which would represent her share of the earnings on the first $300,000 upon $100,000,000 of capital. If this amendment should be adopted, then the Government would take 20 per cent of the $15 which was the earning on $5,000.

It does seem to me, as I have stated, that it exaggerates the evil which may exist in a flat tax by increasing it right where it ought not to be increased. However, if we avoid the flat tax, we have got to go back to a tax based upon the amount of earnings upon the capital invested. When we get into that it is necessary that we should have some sum as our basis—8 per cent or 6 per cent or 5 per cent—and then levy the tax upon a certain per cent of the percentage of the earnings. It seems to me that we would be getting into deeper water instead of relieving ourselves by adopting either of these amendments.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion this morning with a great deal of interest, and it has served to emphasize the situation which I tried to present to the Senate on yesterday. If the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is adopted it will undoubtedly result in very great hardship to certain interests. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has called attention to real estate corporations. It would undoubtedly increase their taxes by 50 per cent. I have called attention to the public utilities of the country whose rate of earnings is fixed by law or is fixed in pursuance of law.

I desire to call attention to another class of corporations. Take the live-stock corporations of the country and the farming corporations of the country. The bill which comes from the Finance Committee as well as the amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts presents probably will increase the taxes upon those concerns by 50 per cent. Certainly the bill which the committee proposes will do that. It is possible, and in many cases certain, that the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts would prevent that very grave injustice to many such corporations.

The farming industry and the live-stock industry of the country are suffering to-day, perhaps, as are no other industries in the land; yet the bill which comes from the Committee on Finance proposes to increase their taxes by 50 per cent. It is utterly indefensible; and I should like to have Senators who come from the section of the country where we have such live-stock corporations, which are making modest earnings upon their investment, which have but modest incomes, say whether they are willing deliberately at this time to increase the taxes of such associations by 50 per cent and reduce the taxes of the corporations of the country that are making large profits? Are those Senators going to tax at higher rates the utility corporations, whose earnings are absolutely controlled by law?

Take the railroads of the country under the Esch-Cummins law. The Interstate Commerce Commission interprets that law to mean that the railroads must levy freight rates and passenger rates to such an extent that after paying all expenses, all charges, including taxes, those concerns shall have a net profit ranging from 5½ o 6 per cent. If we are going to increase their taxes by 50 per cent, then we shall have to increase their rates in order to meet the bill. We can not escape that conclusion.

So with all the other concerns of the country which are now in a state of depression. Mark what I say. All of the corporations in this country that are now suffering from adverse conditions, that are suffering the ills and the perils of this time of financial and industrial disturbance—all those concerns are to have their taxes increased by 50 per cent; but the prosperous concerns, even in these times of adversity, are to have their taxes reduced. I submit that that is absolutely indefensible.

Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to enter into a discussion of the excess-profits tax; I take it that the Senate has deliberately decided that it will not levy an excess-profits tax; but I want to submit this thought: The excess-profits tax, with all its ills, is much fairer, more just, more equitable than is the proposal of the committee to levy a flat tax upon corporations. It has been said by the acting chairman of the committee that the committee adopted the present plan because they had to get the money. That is the only reason. Now, if it is desired simply to get the money, regardless of the inequities which are to be placed upon the people of the country, certainly the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is preferable to that proposed by the committee, because the Senator's amendment certainly goes into the biggest pile. Senators may say what they please as to the inequities of his amendment—and there are unjust and inequitable features about it, and he himself says he made the proposal only as a choice of evils—but if these inequitable things are to be done, if Senators on the other side are simply trying to go somewhere for the sole purpose of getting the money, then I say go to the biggest pile. That is what the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does. As between two evils, I should by all means accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, because we should thereby at least be going to the biggest pile.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the biggest pile represented only 1 per cent and the smaller pile represented 100 per cent upon the invested capital, would the Senator still say "go to the biggest pile," even though it represented only one-hundredth part of the per cent of the smaller pile?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I realize the force of what the Senator from North Dakota has said; but, turn which way we will, to the amendment proposed by the committee or that proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, we are going to run into difficulties. There may be much force in what the Senator from North Dakota has said, but I do not think that the objection to the amendment of the junior Senator from Massachusetts outweighs the objectionable features of the committee amendment. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts certainly has one merit, it strikes at the biggest pile, and by striking at that biggest pile, if the tax is distributed among a large number of people, as referred to by the Senator from North Dakota, it will not affect each individual very much; but the principle of discrimination pervades both of these proposals. If Congress wants to do justice it is driven to some other course.

As I said on yesterday, the excess-profits tax at least did one thing, it put its hands only upon those who were making above 8 per cent profit upon their invested capital. There are many arguments against the excess-profits tax. As I pointed out in 1917, when it first came before the Senate, the excess-profits tax by allowing a flat exemption of 8 per cent discriminated between the businesses of this country. An 8 per cent exemption for a staid old national bank or corporation dealing in staple products that had been doing business for a number of years is itself an undue exemption as against other businesses. The stock of the Chemical National Bank of New York for years was selling upon the open market on the basis of a return of only 4 per cent, and when a flat exemption of 8 per cent before the excess-profits tax applies is allowed in the case of such a corporation it permits that bank to increase its profits by 100 per cent without any excess-profits tax. When, however, we go to the great western section of the country, where business is risky, where it is new, where it is exploring the country and developing an unknown field, an exemption of only 8 per cent for business, that is absolutely unfair and is a discrimination against what should be considered a very modest income. Excess-profits taxes on income over 8 per cent in a new manufacturing corporation, in a mining concern, in any concern which goes out pioneering and developing the resources of the country, is an unjust tax and is an obstruction to the further development of the country.

There are, I repeat, many things to be said against the excess-profits tax, but I want to suggest that if the committee had devoted its time and its efforts to remedying the defects of the excess-profits tax, if it had tried to find some way to make that tax more equal, I submit that it would have done a great service to the country.

Senators talk about invested capital, but I want to say that the present revenue law has been in operation now for three years. Great trouble has been experienced with it, but during the three years there is perhaps hardly a corporation in all the land that has not had its invested capital fixed by the Treasury Department. They have come to adjust their capitalization to the law. It is in operation, and I do not believe that there is any administrative difficulty in continuing it in operation. Those difficulties have been thrashed out, but at least the inequities of it has become known, and they can in a measure be rectified; and certainly as preferable to this bill the excess-profits tax stands out with preeminence. It has everything in its favor compared to this proposal, this levying of a flat tax.

The Senator referred to what he called the overcapitalized corporation. Mark you, Senators, under the provisions of the excess-profits tax as it is written into the present law the water has been squeezed out of the capital of such concerns. It no longer represents water. It is not overcapitalization in the sense to which the Senator from North Dakota referred, but it is large capital actually employed in the business, large capital owned by hundreds of thousands of people, each one owning a comparatively small interest in the business. When you talk about the so-called overcapitalized corporation you are not penalizing that corporation, but you are penalizing the hundred thousand small stockholders who own the corporation. You can not justify any tax upon a corporation by reason of its mere size.

You talk about mere size, and when you do that you are dealing with great aggregations of your fellow citizens. If you have to have the money, instead of considering the size of the corporation consider the size of the pile, as does the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

I want to say that this country never will be satisfied until you put into the law an excess-profits tax as nearly just as it can be framed, or until you put into the law a graduated tax on the undistributed earnings of corporations. The excess-profits tax bears unequally far more than a graduated tax upon undistributed profits. As I say, the excess-profits tax in many cases is paid by those corporations having large numbers of stockholders, and any tax paid by the corporation is a tax against all of the stockholders at a flat rate, regardless of their income. Any tax placed upon a corporation is, as to the stockholders, a flat tax. You can not escape the result, and to that extent you are discriminating against the small stockholders of the country and relieving the large stockholders, those having large dividends, from a progressive tax.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as illustrating what the Senator from New Mexico is saying, I should like to submit a few figures which have been verified by one of the Treasury experts.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. POMERENE. Let us take one corporation with $100,000 capital and $100,000 net surplus. The corporation would have $85,000 and the tax would be $15,000 under the Senate amendment as it has been adopted. The Senator from North Dakota referred to a $5,000 stockholder. The $5,000 stockholder would get one-twentieth of that net surplus, or $4,250 dividend on the stock, if all were distributed.

Take another corporation with a capital stock of $100,000,000 whose net surplus was $100,000, or 1 mill. The tax on this corporation which makes only 1 mill profit would be the same, $15,000, as it was on the $100,000 corporation with $100,000 of profit. The widow who might have $5,000 worth of stock in this corporation, if the surplus were all divided, would get $5 on her $5,000, subject to her portion of the tax, 75 cents. She would get, net, $4.25.

You have these two corporations, one making 100 per cent profit and one making 1 mill profit, and the tax paid by each of them the same, viz, $15,000. How can this be just to the stockholder?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am very glad, indeed, to have the Senator present those figures for the RECORD. They certainly demonstrate the enormity of the proposition presented here by the committee. They present the further point that if the corporation distributes its net earnings to the stockholders without the payment of any tax by the corporation, to that extent you have absolute equality among the stockholders of corporations, among individuals, and among members of partnerships. To the extent of the distribution of the net income of a corporation, if the corporation has paid no tax, you have absolute equality; and the only phase of the case where inequality can creep in is where the corporation pays the tax for the stockholder. Whenever the corporation pays any tax for the stockholder you bring about discrimination, and when you increase the flat tax on all corporations from 10 to 15 per cent you are magnifying the disparity by 50 per cent. You are increasing it to that extent.

So, Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt that when the people of this country realize just what is going on they are going to turn to the least of all these evils, and that is to let the corporation pay a tax only with respect to that part of its income which it does not distribute to its stockholders. As I said, you can not escape the logic that if corporations distribute to their stockholders all their income, and let those stockholders receiving that income add it to their income from other sources and pay taxes just the same as other individuals, you have absolute equality; but whenever the corporation pays any tax upon any theory for the stockholders you bring about inequality, and this is not the time for inequality in taxation. These burdens are large and oppressive. The country is passing through a stress of adversity; and at this time of all times should we not seek equality, equity, even if it should bring about some reduction in revenue?

Mr. President, you can not escape the logic of what I have been saying. As you increase the payments by the corporation you increase the inequality, and when you undertake to levy a flat tax upon corporate earnings you are violating that other fundamental principle of having those pay who are best able to pay. You may say what you please about the evils of the excess-profits tax, but it did have that one salient virtue. It placed the burden upon those who were best able to pay, those who were earning a profit beyond a definite and fixed net return upon their invested capital. It had that virtue; but, as I say, any tax paid by a corporation violates the other fundamental principle of equality.

If you are seeking equality, if there is to be some inequality, do you not want to have the inequality as small as you can get it?

If to the extent that these corporations distribute their incomes you let the stockholders pay their taxes, normal and surtax, for themselves, to that extent you have secured absolute equality, and it is only with respect to that portion of the net income of corporations which is not distributed that the inequality arises.

Assume that they distribute half to their stockholders; then your inequality rests only upon the other half. You can not escape the logic of that statement, that whenever you require the stockholders to pay all their taxes upon all their dividends and the corporation not pay it for them you broaden the field of equality; but as you step into the field of the payment of taxes by the corporation for the stockholder to the extent that you enter that field you increase the inequality, because the individuals of this country own these corporations. Every individual who has a share of stock in any one of them has just the same relative interest in the assets of that corporation as has the man who owns a large number of those shares, and when the corporation pays any tax you are producing, as I say, inequality as between fellow citizens.

Now, my friends, I want to suggest this: We have just fought out this great war. The people of this country have made sacrifices from one end of it to the other. We all strove to win that great victory.

There was no favoritism among the people of this country when they were bearing that burden, and by reason of those joint and mutual sacrifices somehow or other the people of this Nation were brought a little closer together. We think more of our fellow men to-day than we did before the war. We are more considerate of each other than we were before the war, and in this hour of good feeling and good fellowship are you going to do an injustice to those patriotic citizens, one just as loyal and patriotic as another, one just as much entitled to the protection of his Government as another? Are you going to be unjust as between them and leave an unequal burden resting upon the shoulders of some during this period of adversity? That is just what this bill will do, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts would do the same thing in a little different way and in some instances to a less degree.

As between the two, I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; but I want to exempt from the provisions of any of the amendments, if we are to have such a system at all, the public utilities of this country, the live-stock corporations, the farming corporations, and the rent corporations; but when you begin exempting, where will you stop? The reason you want exemption is because those particular lines of industry are, during this stress of adversity, suffering by reason of the conditions which confront them every day.

But this bill, even with this amendment, increases the burden, and, as so eloquently stated by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], you are putting an additional burden upon those who have been adversely affected by these times and taking it off of those who are prosperous. I submit that the people of this country will not tolerate such an injustice.

So I say that Senators on the other side of the Chamber may feel that a coalition exists over there sufficiently large to pass this bill, but I predict that you could not pass it by a majority of the people of the United States. If the people of this country ever understand that you are discriminating against the people of small incomes, that you are discriminating against the business which is suffering in this period of adversity, they will not tolerate such an infamous proceeding.

Nothing has been said to justify this bill. Every person who has referred to it has referred to it with an apology. Every man who is going to vote for this bill and for this provision, whenever he has uttered a word upon the floor of the Senate has uttered it with an apology. I say that the people of this country are not going to accept such an apology. If you have not the scientific knowledge, if you have not the human intelligence, to bring in a bill which has less discriminatory burdens in it than this, I submit that the people of this country will at least experiment with somebody else and see if they can not find somebody who will bring in a better bill.

Mr. KING. It will not be an experiment, it will be a fact, if they choose the Democrats.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Acting upon the very valuable suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I would like to perfect my amendment by adding the language which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The READING CLERK. Add, at the end of the amendment proposed, the following proviso:

Provided, That a corporation which did not pay an excess-profits tax upon its income for the calendar year 1920 under the revenue act of 1918 shall not be taxed on its net income more than 10 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I may add, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit, that if that proviso is adopted, no corporations except those which in 1920 paid excess-profits taxes will, under any circumstances, pay a higher corporation tax than is provided for in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me that I may ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KING. If this amendment should be adopted, how much would it diminish the revenue which it is contemplated will be raised by the amendment under consideration?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not know. It can not be very much, because it affects only that group of corporations which have a revenue of more than $300,000 per year. Some of those, as has been pointed out, were earning very small dividends, and have never earned an excess profit. They are eliminated from the necessity of paying a higher net income tax than at present. They will have to pay only 10 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me, I would like to ask whether the phraseology of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin has been changed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Not in substance. I do not know the exact phraseology of his amendment, but I have made my amendment apply to those corporations which paid excess-profits taxes in 1920 on the theory that 1920 was a better year by which to judge the normal business of a corporation than the present year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it might happen that a corporation might subsequently become highly profitable, and it would still be subject to only the small tax. It seems to me that the words should be so arranged as to give that amelioration of taxation to those companies which made not over 8 per cent during the calendar year provided for taxation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to receive any suggestion the Senator has to make in that direction. I do not think there is any immediate prospect of any corporations of the country getting into the excess-profits class that did not pay an excess-profits tax in that year.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understand the amendment correctly, if a corporation did not make any excess profits in 1920, although it would make 500 per cent in 1922, it would be relieved from the higher brackets of taxation?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is exactly true, and exactly the same thing would be true under the committee amendment. The committee amendment does not increase the taxes, and the tax under the committee amendment is exactly the same upon the corporation that makes 1,000 per cent as upon a corporation which makes 1 per cent. This prevents increasing the tax of those corporations which have not paid an excess-profits tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is it not also true, under the wording of this proviso, that a corporation which paid an excess-profits tax under the law of 1918 would not be relieved from this higher tax? An inequality and an injustice is brought about in that respect. If the corporation has reformed its ways, and is not now paying an excess-profits tax under the particular wording of the proviso that corporation would still have to pay the higher tax of 15 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think I can not yield for a discussion of the amendment at this time. I would suggest that Senators confer about it, and see whether the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is exactly what he desires it to be. It is clear from the amendment as presented that the Senator has a certain principle in mind, and he has applied that principle in his amendment. It possibly may require some amendment to fit it to the bill.

Mr. President, I think no Senator has urged more strenuously than I have the duty of corporations in the country to contribute their full share toward the payment of the expenses of the Government and the liquidation of its great war obligations. No one has urged more vigorously than I have that if they are to be relieved from the excess-profits taxes, an equal tax in some other form, and yielding substantially the same amount, which could not be easily passed on to the consumer, should be imposed upon them. That proposition is absolutely unassailable, unless it can be shown that the corporations have been paying more than their fair share, and I think that can not be shown. But, Mr. President, in increasing the corporate tax because of the repeal of the excess-profits tax which they alone have heretofore had to pay, I do not wish to see that transfer accomplished in a way that will work unspeakable injustice to a part of the corporations of the United States.

The proposition in the bill as brought in by the committee is to relieve the corporations of their excess-profits taxes to the amount of $400,000,000 and to make that up in part by imposing upon the corporations an additional income tax of 5 per cent. I would be glad to see the loss entailed by thus relieving the corporations recouped by imposing a tax that would yield not only the $267,000,000 which the 5 per cent will yield, but to the full extent of the $400,000,000 of which they have been relieved. But can any Senator justify the effort to recoup this proportion of the taxes that have been remitted to corporations by imposing an additional 5 per cent upon the corporation that never had to pay any excess-profits tax while that tax was in effect and that is in no way whatsoever benefited by the repeal?

Do you deny that you have proposed this 5 per cent additional for the purpose of making up what has been lost by the repeal of the excess-profits tax? Do you deny the proposition that you are increasing by that method the taxes of 100,000 corporations in the country, which never had to pay any excess-profits tax and which have received no benefit whatsoever from the repeal? Nothing could be more unjust than that. If it is your purpose, and that is your declared purpose, to make up to the Treasury a part of the loss of revenue resulting from the repeal of the excess-profits tax, I submit that every principle of justice and of equity and of fair dealing requires that you should raise that additional amount out of the corporations which have been relieved by the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

I wish any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber would rise in his place and give any reason why that large increase in the corporate taxes or any part of that burden, the purpose being to make up what has been lost by the repeal of the excess-profits tax, should be imposed upon a corporation which got no benefit from its repeal.

Now, Mr President, we of the minority have seen this result from the beginning. We have recognized this injustice. We have felt that it ought to be remedied in some way or other. What are we here for now? We are here for the purpose of revising the revenue legislation of the country, not for the purpose of doing it temporarily, not for the purpose of passing a temporary emergency revenue bill, but, as the country has been given to understand, for the purpose of passing a permanent revenue bill. It was charged, and properly charged, that the old bill having been formulated in time of war in great haste when it was necessary to exhaust every source of revenue possible, many inequalities resulted. Nobody attempted to say that the war revenue bill was one which equitably adjusted and distributed the $8,000,000,000 of taxes which we had to raise. No one failed to recognize that we had to frame that bill in a great hurry to meet the exigency that was expected to last but a short time, and everybody admitted that when peace came it would become our duty to revise that law and to pass a permanent revenue bill that would justly, equitably, and evenly distribute the burdens of taxation.

The Republicans told the country that the new revenue bill was to be a scientific, logical, and well-balanced method of internal taxation, yet in this amendment we discover, in addition to the other inequalities which have been pointed out, and some of which you have remedied after we had exposed them, that you have no just and equitable plan to recoup the revenue loss resulting from the repeal of one of the vital taxes in the old bill, and you offer to the Senate no excuse for the perpetration of the inequality and wrong we now point out.

You say that the bill is complicated, that you did not have time to thoroughly investigate and to devise a system that would be equitable and just to all taxpayers in the country. I say that is one reason why we should not attempt, in the hurry that has characterized these proceedings, to revise the bill, especially in those particulars which fundamentally affect every citizen's taxes.

I say to the majority members of the Finance Committee that if they had taken even a day or two and devoted it exclusively to a discussion of the question involved in this amendment of the committee and made an honest, sincere effort to bring about parity as to the taxes to be paid by the different classes of corporations, in view of the fact that a part of those corporaions had been relieved of an enormous burden, there would have been no difficulty, in my judgment, in framing a measure which would have met the merits of the situation.

I can say offhand, Mr. President, how that could be reached. If a tax of 10 per cent were imposed upon corporations whose net incomes were each not in excess of 8 per cent of their invested capital, and a tax of 15 per cent upon corporations whose net incomes were each in excess of 8 per cent and not in excess of 16 per cent, and a tax of 20 per cent upon corporations whose net incomes were in excess of 16 per cent of their capital, that would remove the discrimination which the amendment works between the small corporations with small earnings and those corporations of large earnings on invested capital.

Now, Mr. President, I ask in all good conscience how can a great political party, claiming to exemplify the highest moral ideals, claiming extraordinary capacity of statesmanship and ability to meet any political or economic question that may arise, go before the country and say, "we have imposed a tax of 5 per cent additional upon a corporation whose earnings were so low during the war that it paid no excess-profits tax whatever? To recoup the loss of revenue resulting from repeal of these taxes against corporations whose excess profits during that time ran from 100 to 200, 300, 400, even to 500 per cent we are increasing those taxes against the weak corporations just as we are increasing them against the strong corporations, for no other reason than to make up the loss to the Treasury as the result of the repeal of the excess-profits tax." If that is not a proposition, Mr. President, to deal harshly, to say the least, with the weaker taxpayer while dealing generously with the corporations that are strong and powerful and able to pay, I am unable to understand it. I do not think the majority wants to take that position.

This is not a difficulty that can not be met. I do not say that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] entirely remedies the evil; it does so only in part. So far so good; but there is an evil, there is a defect, there is an injustice, there is a wrong which can be remedied. How are Senators on the other side of the Chamber going to defend themselves when this wrong is pointed out to them—when they make no decent or reasonable effort to remedy it? They can not justify themselves before the people for this outrageous injustice to one-half of the corporations of the country and this outrageous gratuity to the other half of the corporations by saying, "We had to have the money." If they must have the money, why do they not retain the excess-profits tax? That is a much more justifiable and equitable system of taxation of corporations than is this. There is justice, there is equity, there is defense for the excess-profits tax, but there is none for the discriminating manner in which it is now proposed to raise this additional money. I do not say that we do not need to raise that much and more; but it is against the discriminating manner, the grossly and almost unspeakably unjust manner in which it is proposed to raise it, that I complain.

Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts was one of the amendments spoken of by me in my original speech as constituting a part of the Democratic program. I say it helps, but it does not completely meet the situation. Practically every other suggestion that was made at the time with reference to the improvement of the pending bill in its vital features was adopted by the agricultural bloc on the other side of the Chamber.

I am very grateful to them for that; the country is very grateful to them for it; but they have had to suffer abuse and criticism by members of their own party, because when they understood the features of the bill which I discussed at that time and which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] discussed, notwithstanding the action of their own Committee on Finance—and its action was the action of the majority and not of the minority—they were so impressed with the inequities and the disparities which had been pointed out that they as a body made their displeasure with the bill known and demanded of their own members of that committee that the defects should be remedied, and remedied as suggested on this side of the Chamber. That was on their part a mere recognition of the justice of our criticism of the inequities of the bill; and their action on this behalf has met, I am pleased to think, a ready response from the people of the country; not of all sections, Mr. President, but, taking the country as a whole, the action of the so-called agricultural bloc, now spoken of in derision by some of their colleagues, was approved as patriotic and was a recognition of the justice of our criticism and of the defects of the bill.

Why they did not include in their demands of the committee the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts I do not know, except that up to that time no attempt was made, either by myself or by the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Missouri, to discuss the amendment. It was expected that the Senator from Massachusetts, who was to offer the amendment, would discuss it. However, Mr. President, I have so much confidence in what is called the agricultural bloc on the other side of the Chamber, I am so sure that upon these questions they are in agreement with us, I am so sure that they do not want to see any part of the citizenship of this country unjustly taxed, that they, like us, want to see every man and every institution of this country made to pay his or its full share of the taxes, that I firmly believe if the amendment now offered by the Senator from Massachusetts had been as thoroughly explained before they acted as it has been explained by the able Senator from Massachusetts in the brilliant speech which he made here this morning, the agricultural bloc would have included in their demands upon the Republican membership of the Finance Committee the proper and the just imposition of the additional tax made necessary upon corporations by the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

I believe that firmly. I believe that the reason they did not include this amendment in their demands was that it had not been explained, and, therefore they did not understand it, for, if they did understand it, their sense of justice and patriotism and duty to the people of this country would have called upon them, overwhelmingly and irresistibly, to include this amendment or something equally as good or better in their demands upon the committee; and we know that such a demand would have been answered.

Mr. President, I want to appeal to that portion of the Senate to-day, to the agricultural bloc, who, in these tax matters, are standing abreast with this side of the Chamber, who are animated with the same purposes that animate us—justice to every taxpayer, high or low—who are determined that no big and rich and powerful individual or corporation shall escape his or its just share of the taxes and that more than his just share shall not be imposed upon the humblest citizen or the highest citizen. I believe that they will stand with us upon that principle. Their action in making their demands gives me courage to make this appeal to them.

Here is something that was not attended to then. I believe it was not attended to because the situation had not then been disclosed. It is disclosed now; the agricultural bloc can see the injustice in connection with this proposal of the committee just as they saw the injustice pervading other matters upon which they have acted; and I want now to say to those Senators that, so far as I am concerned, and I believe so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, we have heartily cooperated in these other matters; we are in accord; we have so far voted together, and I hope that we shall continue to the end to vote together upon the vital question that we now have under consideration.

I ask them to consider the amendment now, not with closed minds, not with minds fettered by any understandings or agreements or compromises, but, rising above that, to insist that no compromise can restrain them from doing equity and justice to the taxpayers of the United States. I hope they will take up this amendment and give it serious consideration and help us in so far as it is ineffective to amend it so that it may reach the merits of the situation.

I believe it can be done; and I ask the cooperation of those Senators upon no ground in the world, Mr. President, except that they have shown a disposition to look at the situation from the standpoint from which we look at it, and have evinced a disposition to treat it in the same spirit of equality and justice and right that we have shown; a disposition to tax everybody properly and to tax nobody improperly. Upon that faith I make this appeal. I do it in all honesty and in all sincerity. I do not know whether in the present situation they will receive it kindly or receive it unkindly; I can not control their attitude; but I make the appeal in good faith.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of presenting an amendment to this section of the bill for the purpose of consideration when the bill gets out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate. I understand that under the unanimous-consent agreement no amendment can be considered regarding this provision of the bill except the so-called Walsh amendment. I desire to offer the amendment I am now presenting to the bill when it gets into the Senate:

On page 79, after the word "amount," in line 7, insert the following: "Provided, That in case of farming and live-stock corporations and public utilities whose rates or charges are subject to regulation by law or to administrative action pursuant to law, the rate shall be 10 per cent regardless of the amount of the net income."

I ask that that amendment be printed and lie on the table for consideration when the bill reaches the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the yeas and nays were called for.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been called for and are in order. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], who is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore withhold my vote.

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 153, strike out lines 1 and 2 and substitute the following:

(b) For each calendar year thereafter 10 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income does not exceed $100,000; 15 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $300,000; and 20 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000: Provided, That a corporation which did not make a net taxable income of more than 8 per cent on its invested capital for the taxable year shall not be taxed on its net income more than 10 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the difference between the amendment offered now and the amendment just voted upon is that the amendment just voted upon provided that no corporation which did not pay an excess-profits tax in 1920 should pay a higher rate on its net income than 10 per cent. This amendment provides that in the future no corporation which does not make more than 8 per cent upon its invested capital shall pay a rate upon its net income of more than 10 per cent. On this amendment to the amendment of the committee I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think this is substantially the amendment I suggested some time ago. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and, I think, some other members of the Finance Committee, stated that it retained the objectionable feature of the invested capital provision. I think the amendment can be so framed as to avoid that objection and still accomplish the same purpose. I would have no objection to the adoption of this amendment now, with the understanding that when it gets into the Senate a substitute will be offered which will meet the objection which is being made by members of the Finance Committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the suggestion is very agreeable to me. The only reason why I put the other amendment first was to avoid the objection which has been raised upon the other side upon any provision at all being contained in this revenue bill which involves the proposition of a tax on profits.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Is there any way by which we can ascertain what the substitute will be? I do not like to have a proposition voted in with the understanding that some substitute is to be offered later on. The Senator from Massachusetts is the only one who has authority to offer a substitute.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am content with the amendment which I have offered. If any Member of the Senate can suggest an improvement upon this amendment when the amendment reaches the Senate, I shall be glad to cooperate; and I am sure the Senator from Indiana would be glad to have any additions made to the amendment which would mean its improvement, assuming that its principle is adopted.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator offer it, then, with the understanding that some substitute is hereafter to take its place?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no substitute to offer, but the Senator from Wisconsin has stated that there may be a suggestion made when the amendment comes into the Senate which will improve it, and I have told the Senator that I would be very glad to receive any suggestion in the way of an improvement when the amendment gets into the Senate, if it is agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Have the two Senators conferred as to what the substitute shall be?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I personally think this amendment is an excellent one, even a better one than the one which was just voted upon. The reason why I put the other amendment first was because it excepted completely the theory of taxing corporations which the majority suggested, namely, a flat tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Indiana that I think what the Senator means is what I said, substantially, a little while ago. The proviso to the amendment offered clearly outlines the principle. It may be slightly defective. If this amendment is agreed to, the friends of the amendment certainly would have the privilege of revising it between now and the time when the bill gets into the Senate and offering the revised amendment as a substitute in the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this amendment provides that no corporation which does not earn more than 8 per cent on its invested capital shall pay to exceed 10 per cent of its income. The junior Senator from Wisconsin says that he thinks this can be modified so that it will not bring into question invested capital and therefore the element of an excess-profits tax. I certainly would like to have the Senator from Wisconsin inform me how we can arrive at the 8 per cent profit, which is to be the dividing line between the lower and the higher brackets, without determining first what the invested capital is upon which that 8 per cent is to be calculated.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say that Dr. Adams has made a suggestion to me which I think obviates this difficulty, and that is, instead of placing it upon invested capital, apply it upon the average value of the capital stock.

Mr. McCUMBER. I must say that that introduces again the same thing we voted out the other day—the question of the excess-profits tax. In addition to that we are voting on this amendment without the slightest idea of how much it is going to affect the revenue or how we are going to raise the revenue to take the place of what is lost by the adoption of the amendment. I can not say myself to what extent it will affect the revenue, but I am informed that it will affect it to a very considerable extent, and we must make other provisions for levying the amount of taxes that will be lost by this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that a 10 per cent tax would yield $460,000,000, and that a 15 per cent tax, upon which we are counting, will raise $655,000,000 according to our estimate. This would cut off at least $100,000,000 in my opinion. That is only an opinion. I have not figured it, nor could I, until I went into the figures as to the number of corporations whose income is less than 8 per cent and who paid no excess-profits taxes, and that is a hard thing to find out, but in my opinion, offhand, Mr. President, I have not any doubt but what there would be a loss of about $100,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, of course this amendment affects the revenue, because the objection to the committee amendment is that it raises revenue by increasing the taxes 50 per cent upon half, the poorer half, of the corporations of this country, and that is the objection to it. I am seeking by my amendment to prevent increasing taxes upon this class of corporations, the class that has not been making large profits, and therefore there must be a consequent reduction in revenue to the Government. I am trying to stop increasing taxes on the business concerns of the country that can not possibly bear the burdens of an increased tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the committee.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as before and being unable to get a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]). Not being able to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I make the same announcement with reference to my pair as on the previous vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair as on the former vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. UNDERWOOD'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement as to my pair which I made on the previous vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I am unable to get a transfer and withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 33, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. EDGE. Do I understand that the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are now working would preclude the presentation of any further amendment to this particular section?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would; except by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. EDGE. The reason why I ask is that I wish to give notice that if the unanimous-consent agreement does preclude the introduction of amendments now, when the bill reaches the Senate I shall offer an amendment which will retain the present straight 10 per cent corporation tax in place of the committee's presentation of 15 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to give notice that I reserve the right to offer both these amendments to the amendment of the committee when the bill reaches the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such notice is not necessary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. REED. Is the legislative status such that we must now proceed with the regular committee amendments, or is the bill open generally to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment is next in order.

Mr. REED. What amendment next, may I inquire?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 230, on page 78.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the amendment of the committee to which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] directed his amendment been adopted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suppose, in the absence of further amendments, the committee amendment is in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no further amendment to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a moment until I can turn to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is at the foot of page 78.

Mr. REED. In the print which I have before me that is an amendment to section 814. There are so many prints I can not find the amendment now pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The pending amendment is on page 78, beginning in line 21, where it is proposed to insert a subhead, "Part III—Corporations," and a subhead under that, "Tax on corporations," and section 230.

Mr. REED. I do not like to delay the Senate, but I do wish I could get straightened out on this matter, because I fear it would operate to deprive me of offering amendments, and I may wish to ask that it be passed over. Which one of the committee amendments is now pending?

Mr. LODGE. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri where his amendment would apply that he has in mind?

Mr. REED. My amendment is to section 230.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I supposed. That section is closed to amendment by the unanimous-consent agreement, which reads:

All amendments to said section 230, except the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], shall be disposed of on said calendar day.

Mr. REED. I am not dealing with that section now or not proposing to amend it, as I understand it.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator was offering an amendment to section 230.

Mr. REED. What I am inquiring about—and I am frank to say I have not been able to get the situation clear in my mind—is whether we are now proposing at this time to act on section 230.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. I make the parliamentary inquiry whether it is the opinion of the Chair under the unanimous-consent agreement that a substitute may not now be offered to section 230?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can not now be offered. It can be offered in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Very well. I give notice, whether it is necessary or not, that I shall offer in the Senate an amendment in the nature of a substitute for a portion of section 230.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the section.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that question I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDGE. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 78, beginning with line 21, insert the following:

PART III.—CORPORATIONS.

TAX ON CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 230. That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1918, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax at the following rates:

(a) For the calendar year 1921, 10 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236; and

(b) For each calendar year thereafter 15 per cent of such excess amount.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment read, on which the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair as before and withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "yea."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. If he were present he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay." I am unable to obtain a transfer and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. That Senator being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I made on the former vote as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 26, as follows:

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is, on page 95, beginning in line 21, to insert under the subhead "Payment of corporation income tax at source," down to line 10, on page 96.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment has been read. Is it desired that it be reread?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, let the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 95, beginning in line 21, it is proposed to insert:

PAYMENT OF CORPORATION INCOME TAX AT SOURCE.

SEC. 237. That in the case of foreign corporations subject to taxation under this title not engaged in trade or business within the United States and not having any office or place of business therein, there shall be deducted and withheld at the source in the same manner and upon the same items of income as is provided in section 221 a tax equal to 15 per cent thereof (but during the calendar year 1921 only 10 per cent), and such tax shall be returned and paid in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as provided in that section: Provided, That in the case of interest described in subdivision (b) of that section the deduction and withholding shall be at the rate of 2 per cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When the Senate recessed yesterday evening there was pending before the Senate an amendment offered by way of substitute for the committee amendment on page 176, applicable to beverages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's statement is correct, and the amendment to which he refers will be pending whenever it is reached.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as I understood the unanimous-consent agreement which was entered into on yesterday or day before yesterday it was to conclude all committee amendments to the title which we had been considering yesterday and have been considering to-day, with the exception of the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SMOOT. That unanimous-consent agreement applied only to section 230, I will say, and not to the entire title.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It applied only to section 230?

Mr. SMOOT. It applied merely to section 230, and that has been acted upon. Now we proceed with the consideration in regular order of the amendments which have been passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Merely to be reminded, I desire to inquire how did we ever reach page 176 last night?

Mr. SMOOT. By passing over by unanimous consent those items which were requested to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is found on page 103, where the committee proposes, in line 2, to strike out "sections 230 and 1000" and to insert "section 230 of this act, and by Title III of the revenue act of 1918."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in lieu of the committee amendment which has just been stated I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota to the committee amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 103, in lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee it is proposed to insert the words "sections 230 and 1000, and by Title III."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 125, where the committee proposes to insert the subhead "Returns to be public records," and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] asked to have that amendment passed over until he could go to his office and procure the papers which he desires to have in the Chamber when he speaks upon this subject. He will be in the Chamber a little later, but we might as well go on with the bill until he can return.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. SMOOT. The same request applies as to the amendments passed over which are found on pages 126 to 128.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments referred to by the Senator from Utah will be temporarily laid aside.

The next amendment passed over was on page 146, to strike out line 1 and insert the subhead "Title IV.—Estate tax."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The next amendment passed over was on page 146, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 400. That when used in this title—

The term "executor" means the executor or administrator of the decedent, or, if there is no executor or administrator, any person in actual or constructive possession of any property of the decedent;

The term "net estate" means the net estate as determined under the provisions of section 403;

The term "month" means calendar month; and

The term "collector" means the collector of internal revenue of the district in which was the domicile of the decedent at the time of his death, or, if there was no such domicile in the United States, then the collector of the district in which is situated the part of the gross estate of the decedent in the United States, or, if such part of the gross estate is situated in more than one district, then the collector of internal revenue of such district as may be designated by the Commissioner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the next amendment passed over, which was on page 146, after line 21, to insert a new section, and reads as follows:

SEC. 401. That, in lieu of the tax imposed by Title IV of the revenue act of 1918, a tax equal to the sum of the following percentages of the value of the net estate (determined as provided in section 403) is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if that is not a little general? It says, "The net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States."

Mr. SMOOT. That is the existing law, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is rather vague. It seems to include everybody in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. There is an exception, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not been able to find it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait until the title is read through, he will find it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the provision simply describes the individuals and then the tax is levied upon their estates in the United States, no matter whether the decedent was a resident or nonresident.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no qualification at all. Apparently it would apply to every decedent, whether he was living in this country or not at the time of his death.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is right if he owns any property here.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no qualification about owning property here.

Mr. McCUMBER. If he owns property here, we levy the tax.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no qualification about owning property here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; there is, if the Senator will follow the provision down.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it might include the estate of Li Hung Chang, who died in China some time ago and left three or four hundred million dollars.

Mr. McCUMBER. Only if he left any property here would it be taxed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator point out where that qualification exists?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is found in the provision which reads:

(b) In the case of a nonresident, by deducting from the value of that part of his gross estate which at the time of his death is situated in the United States—

Then it goes on to make clear that the tax shall only apply to property in the United States, and of course it applies only to such property.

Mr. President, I desire to ask whether we have agreed to everything now down to line 17, on page 148?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have not.

Mr. SMOOT. There are three items, I will say to the Senator, that have been passed over at the request of the Senator from Wisconsin, who has gone to his office to get his papers.

Mr. McCUMBER. I had reference to the estate tax.

Mr. KING. We have not; the Secretary is now reading on page 147.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on section 401. The section has heretofore been read in full. Does the Senate desire to have it read again?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am trying to find out where the reading ended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On page 147, line 5.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota whether the committee, in reporting this provision dealing with the taxes upon the estates of decedents, attempted to ameliorate the condition which has excited a good deal of just opposition to the enforcement of the law, namely, the taxing of the entire estate rather than the distributive share? It has eventuated in conditions of this character: Where there are a number of heirs in the case of one decedent the tax was very much greater with respect to the holdings of the heirs than in those instances where the decedent left but one heir; and there has been a universal demand that correction be made of that great inequality.

Mr. McCUMBER. The tax is levied upon the entire estate, and not upon the several interests of those entitled to the estate.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that in view of the rather drastic estate taxes in some of the States and the provisions of this law many estates have been practically confiscated in meeting the exactions of the Federal Government and the State governments; and it does seem to me that the committee ought to have made some provision to tax the distributive share rather than the entire estate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that matter was fought out on the 1918 tax bill, and it was kept in by a very decisive vote, and it was kept in again this time by the committee by a decisive vote not to change it from the entire estate to the interest of each one of the heirs of the decedent. Personally, I am perfectly free to say that I do not think the Government should lay its hands upon estates at all. There are some things that ought to be left for the States to levy their taxes on, and I think this should be left entirely to the States as a means of taxation; but we have levied the tax, and it materially affects the value of these large estates and the taxes that are to be derived from them if you divide them up into small parcels. The main revenue comes from the very large estates; and it was thought by a majority of the committee that it was best not to reduce the size of the estate by dividing it up among those entitled to it before the tax was levied and thereby reduce the tax.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KING. I have an amendment which relates to this matter, and I am not sure whether it is permissible, under the rules of the Senate as they are applied to the consideration of this bill, as an amendment to this amendment, or whether I must defer offering it until this amendment has been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can offer his amendment now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like first to perfect the amendment which has been offered by the committee.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer amendment numbered 38.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 148, at the end of line 17, it is proposed to strike out the period and to insert:

and does not exceed $15,000,000;
30 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $15,000,000 and does not exceed $25,000,000;
35 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $25,000,000 and does not exceed $50,000,000;
40 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $50,000,000 and does not exceed $100,000,000; and 50 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $100,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I understand that this is the amendment that has been agreed upon as a substitute for or a supplement to the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not understood that it was agreed upon. I supposed that it was offered, but I did not know that the Chair had announced that it was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When I say "agreed upon," I mean agreed upon by somebody.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment which has just been stated by the Secretary to the amendment of the committee as printed in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on a former occasion—I will confess that it was some years ago—I addressed the Senate on the question of the imposition by the Federal Government of inheritance taxes. As I recollect, inheritance taxes were resorted to by the Federal Government for war purposes, and as such I think they are not objectionable; and certainly it can be said that they produce revenue to the governments imposing them, whether they be State or National governments, in a manner that may be termed easy for the collecting agency. Now, however, we have emerged from the war period, and whereas the effects of the war are still upon us in a financial sense, I think it is proper for us to give some consideration at this moment as to what functions the Federal Government shall perform in the matter of imposing taxes, especially when they come into direct competition with taxes which for many, many years have been imposed by the State governments.

Perhaps I should not take the time of the Senate were this last amendment not offered. Were the Finance Committee satisfied to permit the highest tax upon inheritances to remain at 25 per cent in the highest bracket, I think the question would not be acute; but now the proposal is to raise the highest bracket to 50 per cent, and in my humble judgment that does make this question exceedingly acute.

I know that it has been our fashion to sit here in Washington as parts of the machinery of the Federal Government and to lay taxes in our revenue bills without paying much attention to what the States are doing, and forgetting, I fear, a goodly portion of the time that the several States of this Union have exceedingly heavy burdens to carry, that their governments are sovereign in their nature, that the obligations which they have to perform can not be performed by the Federal Government, and for one I hope they never will be attempted. So, starting many years ago, the State governments commenced to develop the field of inheritance taxes in order to build up their revenue and meet their obligations.

The State of New York has for many years imposed inheritance taxes. Those taxes form a considerable proportion of the State's revenue. Without any doubt here in the last few years the rate of that taxation in that State would have been raised——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, has the Senator a statement showing the estate taxes levied by the various States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I have not in all the States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator put it in the RECORD?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish I could get it. It would take quite a bit of research to get it; but I think we can discuss the situation, because, when we stop to think a moment, each Senator can remember what his own State estate tax is.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, if it will not interrupt him, I should like to say that in my State we do not tax property at all for State purposes. We leave all of those sources of taxation to the counties and the cities, and we raise our entire taxes from license taxes, income taxes, and inheritance taxes. I am told that all the States in the Union except three have an inheritance tax; but we do not tax property at all for State purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That has been the policy of the State of New York. In recent years the expenses of the government of the State of New York have risen so much, and the Federal Government has invaded its field of taxation so severely, that the State has been compelled to resort to a direct tax on real estate for the first time in many, many years. Senators may realize what that means in the way of a burden to a taxpayer, for, of course, real estate pays municipal and county taxes, and when it is called upon to pay State taxes in addition it creates a condition that is almost intolerable. The State taxing authorities are very much alive to the situation, and they are very much puzzled as to what they are to do in the future if the Federal Government is continually to invade their province.

The representatives of 38 States met the other day at Bretton Woods, N. H., in a conference. Those representatives were the State tax commissioners of the several States, or other representatives appointed by the governors of the several States; and they adopted a resolution which I think should be read to the Senate.

Whereas at the first conference of the National Tax Association—

This gathering calls itself the National Tax Association—

Whereas at the first conference of the National Tax Association, held in 1907, it was resolved that it was the sense of that conference that inheritance taxes should be reserved wholly for the use of the several States, which resolution has been reaffirmed at subsequent conferences; and

Whereas inheritance taxes have not heretofore been imposed by the Federal Government except as emergency measures in time of war; and

Whereas the Federal estate tax now in force imposes an unduly heavy burden of expense upon the estates of deceased persons, in addition to the tax itself, out of proportion to the revenue received by the Government, seriously interferes with the administration of such estates, and delays final settlement:

Be it resolved, That the estate tax should be recognized by Congress as a war measure only and should be repealed at the earliest possible moment.

Resolved, That the secretary of the National Tax Association be requested to take appropriate action to bring to the attention of Congress the resolution passed by this conference—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I am not here this afternoon and at this stage of the proceedings to urge seriously the repeal of the Federal estate tax which is now upon the statute books, but I am here to protest against the raising of the rates of that tax one penny beyond those proposed originally by the Finance Committee. We can not keep this thing going much further, anyway, as a matter of scientific taxation. I know that it sounds very easy—that is, the suggestion sounds feasible and plausible—that when an estate worth a hundred million dollars or two hundred million dollars is bequeathed, the Federal Government ought to tax the upper brackets in that regard 50 per cent or more. Many people are apt to believe that no hardship is imposed upon the decedent, and, of course, that is true; but the decedent, having passed off the stage and being utterly unconcerned, the point that we have in mind is, what becomes of the estate, especially if the estate is invested in a going business concern?

We might not be so concerned about this matter if the upper bracket tax was confined to a 50 per cent rate; but we have to remember that the States themselves are taxing this same estate, and in many, many instances State taxes duplicate each other clear around the circle.

It so happens that only to-day, quite by accident, I had an opportunity of discussing this matter with a gentleman who for many years has been attorney for the State comptroller of the State of New York in charge of the collection of the New York inheritance tax, and he tells me that the laws of the several States are such that in many, many instances an estate left by a New York State resident is taxed by 17 or 18 other States in addition to New York State, in whole or in part. A New York resident dying and leaving an estate, a portion of which is in the State of Ohio, pays not only the full rate for the entire estate to the government of the State of New York, but he also pays to the State of Ohio a tax on that portion of his estate which is situated in Ohio, and again in Indiana, and again in Illinois, and clear around the circle, so that the tax is constantly mounting up. We must not labor under the impression that the proposition as to this is going to stop at 50 per cent. It goes higher than that, and in my humble judgment reaches the point of confiscation, and when we reach the point of confiscation in taxation we are doing an injury not to the man who is in his grave, for he can not be reached, but to the people who are charged with the responsibility of carrying on a great business concern, upon which hundreds of people may be dependent for employment, and many, many other people indirectly dependent, in one way or another, for their prosperity.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, since the Senator has made reference to the State of Ohio, I am reminded that probably 15 or 18 years ago, when our tax gatherers got busy, for some unaccountable reason there was a strange exodus of many rich people to the Senator's own State.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We caught them there.

Mr. POMERENE. But their property is largely in Ohio.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. It seems to me that, notwithstanding the fact that the Senator's State has the benefit of their presence, we ought to have the benefit of some of their taxes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not complaining about that. I am merely stating the fact, and it has an important bearing upon a Federal estate tax, for we must add these duplicated and triplicated rates of the States in the aggregate to the Federal rates, and when we add them to the higher Federal rates, we reach a point where we are going to kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. REED. I am very sure the Senator did not mean to leave the impression that because the estate of a citizen of New York may pay taxes in 16 or 17 States, they had to pay 16 or 17 taxes, one on top of the other?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. Of course, the most the estate would have to pay would be two taxes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is doubled.

Mr. REED. One in New York, and one in the State where the property is located.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. And then add the Federal tax, and it is tripled when we reach these tremendous rates, and that is what I am complaining against.

Mr. REED. It would be a double tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if the difficulty he suggests in his own State is not that the State of New York is taxing an inheritance that ought not to be taxed in New York, in so far as the property is located elsewhere?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps so; but I am merely stating the fact.

Mr. LENROOT. That is not a reason why the Federal Government should take cognizance of any wrong that may be imposed by the State of New York upon its citizens, and should relieve these estates from Federal taxes because New York is doing something it ought not to do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not asking the Government to relieve these estates from taxes, nor am I saying that New York is the only State that does what I have just described. Nearly all of them are doing it. We have to face the condition. It does no good to rise upon the floor of the Senate and scold the State of New York, or suggest that New York has done wrong. We are not powerful enough here to make New York or any of the other States change. But how about the estates?

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator mean to say that the entire estate is taxed in the State of New York, no matter where the property may be situated?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. STERLING. Is the estate not allowed an abatement for that part of the taxes paid in another State?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it is not.

Mr. LODGE. It is not allowed any abatement in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. KING. And in no State that I know of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know of any State that does allow it; that is the point. I do not care what State we take for example, the result is that large portions of these are paying double taxes before they are ever reached by the Federal Government at all, and the Federal tax makes the triple tax.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me the remedy for the evil the Senator complains of lies with the States. A State government should not impose an inheritance tax on that part of a man's estate that is in another State subject to an inheritance tax.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is easy for Senators to rise here and assert that.

Mr. NELSON. They are imposing a double rate, and it is their own mistake. I would like to ask the Senator a question for my own information. I understood a moment ago the Senator said that until lately they had not for many years had any land taxes in New York. Is that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a direct State tax, not until recently.

Mr. NELSON. Is that a fact?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. NELSON. All over the West the States impose direct land taxes, and we have paid them for years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am sorry for you. I wish the States could avoid that and support the State governments on corporation and inheritance and excise taxes, which the State of New York did for many, many years, and which, in my judgment, it could do nearly every year in the future if it had not reached that place where we find the Federal Government standing right in the way.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. If I remember the terms of the statement made by the tax association read by the Senator, the association holds that taxation by States on inheritances should be reserved to the several States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does. I think myself it is too late; but I think they are correct.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does not the Senator think that inasmuch as these great fortunes are accumulated under the Constitution of the United States rather than within any one State, it is proper they should be taxed by the United States rather than by any one State?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That brings up an academic discussion. It might also be said that these great fortunes are accumulated and protected by the police powers of the States. The Federal Government provides no police protection for them, does not support the fire department or the police department, and has no jurisdiction over the courts in which the wills are brought to probate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator believe in a Federal tax law, the tax to be collected by the General Government, and then certain portions remitted to the States, so as to make it uniform?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would be a scientific distribution of Federal money. I do not know whether we could ever reach such a point in the evolution of our tax system.

There is a duplication in the matter of income taxes, too; and this question of the duplication of taxes by the Federal Government, if it goes on step by step, year after year, will bring us to the point where the States will finally come to Washington and say, "We can not support ourselves any longer."

Mr. LENROOT. When that time comes, will not such action be the pressure which will do just what the Senator from Indiana suggests?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps; I do not know; but it will require some rather drastic amendments to the Constitution to bring such a thing about. However, that is an academic discussion which I did not intend to embark upon, and I would not bring this matter before the Senate at all to-day were it not that the amendment just offered by the Senator from North Dakota provides a big boost again on top of the Federal taxes, and it is a serious matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator if they have a graduated estate tax in New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The inheritance tax in New York is of two kinds: First, the tax is imposed upon inheritances by lineal or direct descent at one rate and at a good deal higher rate on collateral inheritances. The collateral inheritances tax in the State of New York upon occasion has gone up to 25 per cent. It goes as high as 8 per cent now on direct inheritances.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the highest rate on any estate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the figures I have just given.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Twenty-five per cent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Twenty-five and 8 are the highest, I think, which may be collected. That would not be so serious, may I say to the Senator from Michigan, if it were not for the fact that there are portions of the same estate taxed in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, all over the country, doubled up, and we double it again.

Mr. McLEAN. After the States have confiscated 50 per cent and the Government has confiscated 50 per cent there will not be anything left, and the Government will have to resort to a direct tax on land to pay its expenses.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are forcing the States to that now. Eventually the Federal Government will have to do something else. As I said a little while ago, it is very easy to propose to tax an estate of $100,000,000 at the rate of 30 per cent. The average listener would say, "That is easy. Any estate worth a hundred million dollars ought to pay thirty or forty million dollars into the Treasury."

I probably shall never have a chance, but, frankly, I would hate to be the executor of an estate that had to raise thirty or forty million dollars in cash, and then pay the State taxes besides in 4 or 5 or 10 or 17 States. If the estate was invested entirely in securities whose value had not been impaired very severely in the market at the time of the death of the decedent, as executor I probably could raise the thirty or forty million dollars; but suppose the estate is invested in a great manufacturing concern; it would be a mighty difficult thing. Do we intend here in the Congress, or in the States, if we know what we are doing, to compel the liquidation of a going concern in order to raise a sum of money? Every business man knows that when you compel liquidation you destroy value.

What is the situation which confronts the executors of an estate that is taxed in 12 or 14 different States of the Union, and then taxed by the Federal Government as high as 50 per cent in the surtax bracket? The first thing they do is to go out and try to borrow the money. It can not be saved by them in one year's time, or two years' time, or ten years' time. They have to borrow it, and borrow it in huge amounts, if they can command the credit. They have to pay interest on that borrowed money, and the mere fact that a great going business concern has to place a huge loan through the channels of the executors certainly is not healthy for the credit of that concern as a business concern. It injures it.

There is a point where we will have to stop. I believe that this amendment now offered by the Senator from North Dakota reaches the destruction point. You are commencing now to confiscate property. As I said a moment ago, you are killing the goose.

There are some things in this inheritance tax of the Federal Government with which I do not agree. You exempt all bequests to charitable, religious, and educational societies. Consider the effect of that. Witness the great foundations which have been established in this country in recent years, endowed by the millions, all exempt from the Federal inheritance tax. Ways and means will be found in the future to save estates the payment of these inheritance taxes if you raise them so high, and they must be added to the State inheritance taxes, which also are going up. Pennsylvania, I am informed, doubled her inheritance tax only this year.

You will reach the point where you will compel people by hook or by crook to devise their property in some way or another before they die. As was said in the discussion of the surtax rates on the income tax, you will reach and go beyond the saturation point and you will not get the money, or if you do get the money you will get it at the cost of legitimate business enterprises whose values will be depreciated through forced liquidation.

These are the observations I have to make concerning the matter. There is just one other point which I may touch upon and which has to do more with the administration of the tax by the Federal Government. I do not know how it is in other States or what the experience has been, but in New York the appraising authorities of the State department appraise the property of the decedent very promptly. I have known some very large estates of New York residents that have been appraised, millions of dollars of taxes have been paid into the State treasury, and within one year the whole thing settled up, the executor relieved from further responsibility to the State government, and an order entered through the proper State courts to that effect.

But under the Federal administration there is no end to it, apparently. I have known of estates that have gone on for three or four years, waiting for the Federal Government finally to say whether or not the tax has been paid, with no relief, apparently, to the executors, who, of course, can not go ahead and administer the estates with that freedom which is essential to good business management because, forsooth, some clerk sitting behind a desk up here in the Internal Revenue Department is not satisfied that the estate of a decedent who died four years ago has been appraised thus and so. Apparently there is no end. No order is ever entered releasing the executors of their responsibilities to the Federal Government. However, that is a matter of administration and one of the annoyances and nuisances with which the business world is inflicted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, my understanding is that the objection which the Senator now makes has been cured by an amendment to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very glad. I hope incidentally that the exemption will be taken out. I can not understand—and I do not mean to appear heartless or inhuman or unfeeling when I make this observation—why a great university, when it has bequeathed to it $10,000,000 or $5,000,000 or $2,000,000, should not be willing to have that bequest taxed at least to a reasonable extent. The influences that have been brought here to maintain the exemptions in this matter of the inheritance of bequests to educational and charitable and religious institutions are all based upon the theory that without such exemptions the inheritance tax is a tax on charity, a tax on education, a tax on religious associations. I am not sure about the latter, but on the first two at least, the charitable associations and educational institutions, it is not a tax on them. It is merely withholding from them a little bit of the money which they are getting for nothing, and I do not call that taxation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the sound theory of taxation, I think generally accepted, is that taxes should be taken from the earnings of the year; that is, from income. They should not be taken in such a way as to impair capital which is the source of income and the sound source of all taxes. We can go very far in taxing incomes without destroying capital, but when we take money from an estate we take capital, in many cases active capital, and put it into the Treasury and spend it, thereby destroying the accumulated capital of the country.

I know it is very inviting, if a man leaves an estate of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 or $100,000,000, to say, and with some truth, that no one person should have so much money as that, that such large estates are not wholesome.

It is not that, however, that is in question. It is taking money in that form. It may be academic to argue the question, because all countries now impose an estate tax, but in this country, as the Senator from New York has already pointed out, and I do not need to dwell upon it, it is the chief source of revenue of the States. The result is that the estate has to bear the burden of two inheritance taxes in any event, and in many cases on parts of the estate at least a triple tax. All the money that is taken in that way is taken from the total savings of the community, the total capital of the country, and is destroyed for business purposes. It is destroying the resources of the country.

But admitting that we must make up our minds to accept the system of taxing estates, it certainly should be done with moderation and with judgment. There should not be this duplication or triplication of estate taxes with all the uncertainties that they bring and all the heavy loss they cause to estates.

Whether we can come to the system that is suggested by the Senator from Indiana, that all estate taxes should be collected by the United States and then distributed in due proportion to the States from which the money comes, it would certainly be an ideal way of collecting the inheritance taxes.

It is to be remembered that owing to the State laws, and they are all subject to inheritance State taxes, inheritance taxes here are very much more burdensome than in other countries. England lays a heavy inheritance tax, but when that is done that is the end of it. There it is the one tax laid by the general Government. But in the United States it does not stop there. Take one of these large estates which may be invested in business. Liquidation is very likely to be forced, and if it is forced on a falling market the whole estate, even very large estates, may be used up, and it thus amounts to a 100 per cent tax and confiscation of the entire estate, which is entirely withdrawn from business and no longer of use to the community, no longer gives employment, and fulfills all the duties which are so important economically and which can be fulfilled by accumulated capital alone.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Massachusetts alluded to the fact that in some instances the State taxes and the Federal taxes destroy the estate. I have heard of many instances where because of the taxes being cumulative it was impossible to sell the estate to meet the Federal taxes and the State taxes. Many of the heirs, supposing that they had a considerable competency, have been stripped and have gone out into the world deprived of the property which was left to them by their fathers.

Mr. LODGE. I have known of such cases. There was a very large estate bequeathed recently in New York, a large portion of which was left for public purposes. The settlement was forced in order to meet the taxes imposed in New York and the Federal taxes and forced on the falling market through which we have just been passing. The value of the bequests, which were very large and very well distributed to educational and artistic purposes, was cut in two. It was a singularly well-invested estate, and it stood it better than most estates would, but half of that estate went in that way, and was taken from objects which would have been of value to the whole community.

It is an evil more severe in its operation on the small estate, especially in a time when there is a falling market, and they often either have to borrow money or sell the property at a great loss. It is the most destructive method of raising money for taxation that can possibly be imagined. But as we are certain to have the system, it ought at least to be fairly administered, and these gigantic additions which are proposed here seem to me unwise purely from an economic point of view. I am not questioning the taking of millions for public purposes, except that it is such a destructive way of taking them.

Then the system we have here is very bad in another respect which is not now in the bill; that is, of taxing the estates and not the beneficiaries. There never was a more unjust arrangement than that. A man dies and leaves an only child. The estate tax is paid, and it comes out of the whole estate, which all goes to the benefit of that child. Another man dies leaving an equal estate to five children. The five beneficiaries, each of whom only gets one-fifth of the total estate, each have to pay the full estate tax on the whole estate. We have had that question here before, however. It is an injustice that is patent, and ought to be remedied.

The only point I desire to make to-night, because I do not care to go into any long discussion about it, is the unwisdom of taking these vast sums from large estates and small ones, too, but particularly these additions to large estates, in its effect on the business of the country. I know the argument that if a man leaves $100,000,000 why should not $50,000,000 be taken for the Government? If a man has $100,000,000 income it may do to take $50,000,000 of that income, but when we take half of the property—and for the moment I leave out of consideration the State—we may be closing factories, impairing properties which are giving large employment, and destroying active going businesses. It seems to me it is extravagant and unsound in the last degree.

It is better to raise the money in almost any other way than by the excessive taxation of estates. Some taxation of estates there must be. I think in the Senator's own State there is an estate tax that in some cases amounts to 30 per cent, and when the Federal taxes are added pretty nearly the whole estate is gone. That is a disastrous way to tax. It is practically confiscation and will lead to great injury to the business of the country and to the tax-producing sources of the country, or it will be evaded in some way, and the evasion of these laws is extremely unfortunate and very bad.

I regret that it has been thought wise to increase so greatly the estate taxes, which are now extremely heavy. New York differs in no respect, so far as I can understand, from my own State of Massachusetts, where we have collateral and direct taxes on estates. Those taxes are very heavy there, though I do not just now remember the exact rates imposed. However, all of the property of an estate is taxed there, no matter whether it pays a tax in another State or not. Many estates are largely invested outside of Massachusetts. The result is three taxes are paid on the estate. We ought to consider the fact that in many instances an estate has to pay taxes imposed by at least two States. I repeat, I regret that it should have been thought necessary to impose this additional tax, especially as I understand from the experts that the increased rate will not yield more than fourteen or fifteen million dollars.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if these taxes are put into effect during the next two years they will not yield anything.

Mr. LODGE. It will be two or three years, as Dr. Adams now reminds me, before any revenue will be derived from this source.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if the aggregate which is to be derived from these destructive taxes shall not amount to more than fourteen or fifteen million dollars the sum of the damage done will not be very great.

Mr. LODGE. Of course men do not die regularly; that is something which can not be determined; and sometimes the returns from such a tax may be larger. The objection is that by this proposed legislation we shall be terrifying capital in every possible way, making it hide and get out of the way of taxation. We may tax incomes as much as we please, but we do not thereby destroy the capital.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I know that there are sharp differences of opinion as to the wisdom of taxing incomes or inheritances. I have heard Theodore Roosevelt argue with something like vehemence that income taxes were a mistake, but that sharply graduated inheritance taxes were sound. He never pretended to be an economist, but there is some reason to believe that his judgment of the social value of taxes was good.

It should be noted that the amendment reaches fortunes of $15,000,000 and more, and only that portion of great fortunes which exceeds $15,000,000. It should be noted further that the tax of 50 per cent falls only on that part of a fortune which exceeds $100,000,000. If it be true—and I think it is—as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has said, that no harm can be done by this tax to the deceased, then no harm can be done to the heir by this tax, for no man will be a better citizen or be more useful by reason of the inheritance of the second hundred million dollars.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But how about the business?

Mr. McCORMICK. I shall have something to say about that later.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Especially in such a case as that referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], where the whole thing went.

Mr. McCORMICK. If in the case cited by the Senator from Utah "the whole thing went," it would not be by reason of any taxes contemplated in this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was by reason of the Federal tax plus State taxes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Doubtless it was an estate which was largely invested in mining property——

Mr. KING. It was invested in real estate and mining property.

Mr. McCORMICK. And by reason of the peculiar character of the estate and the heavy taxes in the State of Utah it was difficult to liquidate the assets.

The Senator from New York has argued that inheritance taxes should not be imposed except as war taxes. I think that most of us believe of this bill that it is the fruit of the World War.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I made exactly that statement, and I would not urge anything to the contrary.

Mr. McCORMICK. And until another year or two shall have passed we can not expect to revise the terms of the measure which is now before us. Before that time arrives, however, I hope that Congress may make a careful study of the whole principle of the taxation of estates and inheritances; not only, as has been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but also as suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], to see that the tax falls on the sum inherited and that there be taken into consideration the taxes which are levied by the several States. That, however, is not the issue to-day. We have before us what, in effect, is a war-revenue measure. We have been unable to reduce the taxes on the smaller inheritances or the basic tax upon incomes. Is it too much to expect, then, at a time like this that the few estates in this country exceeding $15,000,000 which may become liable to taxation shall bear a proportionate share of the increase in taxation?

At a time when great numbers of men in this country are out of employment, and when others are not making the cost of their crops, when men of meager income can hope for no great relief under the bill, there does not seem to me to be any sound ground for opposing a tax of 50 per cent on that part of a fortune which exceeds $100,000,000.

The imposition of such a tax does not destroy the property; the property itself remains, merely the ownership thereof is transferred, by one means or another, and there is covered into the Treasury a portion of the accumulations of the deceased precisely as there would be covered into the Treasury by taxation a part of his income.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. The point may be academic, but suppose the funds of the estate are largely invested in a great factory and that factory has to be sold in order to pay the tax. The price offered is accepted and half of the proceeds go into the Treasury in the shape of taxes. There are now two blocks of capital where before there was one. One block may be invested outside or may be put in another factory, but the other block is gone. It is lost; it is not kept; it is gone into current expenses; so at least half of the capital is gone.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I have tried to grasp the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts; but, due to a psychological inhibition, perhaps, I can not understand it.

Mr. LODGE. If $100,000 is taken out of the capital and expended in the course of a year, it is gone, so far as the purposes of capital are concerned. Of course, it is so much capital destroyed.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is gone, so far as the capital of the particular individual or corporation is concerned——

Mr. LODGE. It is eaten up.

Mr. McCORMICK. But not so far as the aggregate capital of the country is concerned.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly it is wiped out; there is no addition to the aggregate capital. If you eat a loaf of bread, the loaf of bread is gone.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he takes the position that money expended by the Government never becomes capital in the hands of anybody, but is merely so much money expended.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not say anything as broad as that; but a large part of it is used in meeting current and daily expenses.

Mr. LENROOT. It then becomes capital in the hands of somebody eventually.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is destroyed. What we ourselves spend to support our families, to maintain our homes, to feed our families is lost so far as we are concerned. If it is income, it is all right; we make it and spend it, but if we take capital and expend it it is gone, of course, just as much as if it were burned up.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have felt ever since I have been called upon to deal with the question of an estate tax that under ordinary conditions estates were a very proper source to which we might go for taxes. If all of the assets of an estate were in cash and not invested in a going business, it would be very easy to levy the tax; but I am reminded now of an instance that occurred in my State. Within a year two brothers who owned one of the most prosperous concerns in the State died. Practically all of their money was tied up in one great factory, which was one of the largest factories in the United States. They owned the assets of the business. Their estates were called upon to pay taxes under existing law, and the inheritance taxes and other taxes which were imposed amounted to a very large sum. Before the affairs of the first brother who died had been settled the other one passed away. Then their estates were confronted with the fact that they did not have enough money to pay their taxes and continue their business; and yet, if they sold the business, under another provision of law imposing a tax on the increased value between 1913 and the date of their deaths, there would be absolutely nothing left to the estates.

I do not know just how they have settled it, but it has been a very serious matter, and the situation was still serious when last I heard about it. The estates to which I have referred, as I understand, were, combined, worth about $70,000,000. I am wondering now if such a case as that should occur in the next year after the passage of this act, and we should increase the rate of taxation on such estates, as the amendment reported by the committee would increase it, and add 40 per cent to their taxes, how in the world that concern would be able to continue in business.

That to me is a serious proposition. I do not think that we can afford to have that institution wiped out. It was an institution which had the confidence and respect of all people and was considered one of the finest institutions in our State.

Mr. LODGE. And it employed a great many men, did it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It employed a great many men. It could not continue to do business; that is clear. According to the last accounts I heard, it was having difficulty to continue under existing law and the taxation therein provided. I am wondering just how the amendment now pending would affect such a case as that.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if I remember the case in point, it was not long ago that the widow of one of the partners petitioned the court for an allowance of $500,000 a year, stating that the family had spent a million dollars a year during the life of her husband, and she did not feel that she could live on less; that her personal expenses would amount to that much.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not familiar with that; I do not know and can not state at the moment how they have arranged their affairs, but I know it has been a serious matter for them to consider.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I fail to see the difficulty which the Senator from Michigan suggests in a particular case. Assuming that it becomes necessary for the executor to sell the stock of the decedent, and he says that it is made up very largely of accumulated earnings since 1913, and they would have to pay an income tax upon them, that means that the Government has been deprived during those years of the income that would have been received had those earnings been distributed, does it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not objecting to that.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then when the stock is sold and the estate is settled the taxes that have been paid are deducted from that estate. Supposing that the stock is sold and it is necessary to pay a very large per cent of the proceeds of that sale in income taxes, in arriving at the net estate, of course, that is deducted, is it not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I had not thought about that; I had assumed that it would be a tax upon the estate which the decedent left.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think that for the good of the entire country it would be well to dissipate these enormous fortunes, and scatter them broadcast, instead of having them pile up year after year? Does not the Senator think that the effect on the social fabric would be much better if these fortunes were dissipated?

Mr. LENROOT. Up to a certain point, Mr. President, there can be no possible question concerning the correctness of that statement. I remember that the first time my attention was ever seriously called to this question was in a speech made by ex-President Harrison, where he advocated taking a higher tax than is proposed in this amendment from a large estate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask if he advocated taking a higher tax than is proposed in this amendment, plus State taxes?

Mr. LENROOT. Plus such State taxes as may have existed at that time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at this time, however?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course not, because ex-President Harrison has been dead a good while; but at that time I remember that he advocated an inheritance tax of more than 50 per cent upon large fortunes.

It is true that when we get fortunes exceeding $100,000,000 the continual increase of those fortunes in the hands of one or two individuals is a menace to our social fabric; no one can deny it; and if those large fortunes are divided, either through an estate tax or through previous division, as is suggested by the Senator from New York, it will be a good thing for the public welfare, however they may be divided, and, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] suggests, for the family as well. Where anyone has inherited more than $5,000,000, I doubt whether the excess has not been a positive injury to the person who inherited it, rather than a benefit, in the vast majority of cases.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me a moment——

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator may have noticed that I did not make any plea for the heirs. I was thinking solely of the economic proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I understand.

Mr. LODGE. I think the heirs will be provided for.

Mr. LENROOT. I think so, too.

I want to say in that connection that I am thoroughly in agreement with the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not think this plan of an estate tax is based upon any correct principle. It should be strictly an inheritance tax, and the tax should be based upon the distributive share; and when the Finance Committee shall have completed its work upon this bill and the tariff bill, I hope that one of the first things Congress will take up will be the revision of the law upon this subject.

With reference to the Senator from Massachusetts, however, he objects because he says this tax will destroy capital. Granting for the moment that what he says is true in part, I want to call his attention to the fact that I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts is disposed to favor a sales tax that will soon be offered upon this bill.

Mr. President, there are more than four and a half million men out of employment in the United States to-day, and a very large percentage of those four and a half million men and their families are living from day to day, not upon income, not upon earnings—because they have none—but upon savings that they have made in prior years.

Mr. POMERENE. And some on charity.

Mr. LENROOT. And, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, some on charity; and yet a sales tax will take from every man who has not a daily or a yearly income a part of his capital to exactly the extent that the sales tax is imposed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will yield, is not a sales tax in its final analysis a pure tax upon consumption?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly, upon consumption.

Mr. NELSON. And it will come on the consumer. Every man, woman, and child who has to buy any of those products has to pay the tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. NELSON. And it is distributed, not on the basis of the means of the people, but on the basis of their necessities—as to what they have to buy, not what they earn.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; and, Mr. President, it is not voluntary with any man in the United States, as some suggest, whether he shall buy or not. Men have to live; men have to be clothed; men have to be sheltered; men have to be warmed; and whether they will or not, they must pay this sales tax. They can not avoid it, and if they have no income they must pay it out of capital, which the Senator from Massachusetts objects to in the case of the inheritance tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want to take any of the time of the Senate; but if the Senator is going to discuss that question I think it is fair to say that the taxes that will be abolished certainly will equal what a small sales tax would equal; and not only that, but it will be direct and not indirect, and it will not be pyramided as other taxes are.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator now suggest, then, that he only proposes to substitute a sales tax for such direct consumption taxes as now exist?

Mr. SMOOT. All of the consumption taxes; yes.

Mr. LENROOT. And nothing more?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is something more—certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. Then, to the extent that there is something more——

Mr. SMOOT. But as to the "something more," if you call a tax on transportation a consumption tax, which everybody here in the Chamber says has always been passed directly on to the farmer or the consumer, that and all of the other taxes such as taxes upon insurance here I think I shall remove entirely.

Mr. LENROOT. The transportation tax has been removed.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. And that deficit has been taken care of in another way, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know yet what we are going to do, whether it is or not.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senate has acted on that to the full extent and more than the full extent of the transportation tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but, as I was going to say, I think there is no question but that a manufacturers' tax of 1 per cent, or a turnover tax of one-half of 1 per cent, is the very least burden that can be put upon the consumers of this country.

Mr. LENROOT. Whatever it is, the Senator must concede that if a man has not an income, and he must purchase the things upon which the sales tax is imposed, it is a tax upon capital, a taking from capital, to which the Senator from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. SMOOT. Just exactly the same as any other tax that is imposed, and no more, only the sales tax is a small tax that can not be passed on and multiplied as some of the other taxes have been multiplied.

Mr. LENROOT. The only point I am making at this particular time is that the Senator from Massachusetts objects, because he says this is destroying capital, when, if it is, a sales tax destroys capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Or any other tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Or any other tax that the consumer must pay, and can not pay out of income. I think the Senator from Utah will agree with me about that.

Mr. President, just one word more. As the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] has said, this amendment affects estates only in excess of $15,000,000. The Senator from Massachusetts says that if we impose these taxes upon these very large fortunes they will hide them and get them out of the way. Nearly a week was consumed in this Chamber with the argument by these same Senators that we must not impose a surtax in excess of 32 per cent, because if we did these large fortunes would be invested in tax-exempt securities, and the Government would receive no revenue from them. Now, when we say, "Here is an opportunity to get at, to some extent at least, these very large fortunes where a high surtax is applied; here is an opportunity to get for the Government some of the money that they have escaped paying to the Government by reason of their investment in tax-exempt securities," again these same gentlemen say, "Do not touch it here." A little while ago they said, "Do not touch it there"; and what is the result? The result is, they say, "Do not touch it anywhere if a fortune be large."

Mr. President, this is not the best system; but I see no injustice to these very large fortunes in the adoption of the amendment that is now proposed, and it does not increase the estate taxes upon any estate under $15,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent for just a moment, and I think he wants to offer an amendment to this amendment. He just so informed me, and stated that he would be back in a moment; and I understood that his amendment was directed toward this amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator want to suspend until the Senator from Wisconsin returns to the Chamber?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I do not wish a vote, because he asked me to hold the matter until he could return.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word pending the return of the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume that this matter will take a little longer discussion. I do not want to take advantage of his absence.

Mr. KING. May I occupy the attention of the Senate until the return of the Senator from Wisconsin, or at least for a moment or two?

I have offered an amendment which perhaps might be regarded as a suitable amendment to the pending section, and yet it would be perhaps more apposite if it followed the concluding section of the bill. It reads as follows:

That the President is authorized and requested to invite the governments of the several States of the Union to appoint representatives to confer with representatives to be appointed by the President, to consider the general question of the relation between Federal and State taxation, cooperation in the laying and levying of taxes, and particularly the matter of the conflicting Federal and State taxes upon the estates of deceased persons, and means for the accommodation of such conflicts, and for the allocation or distribution of the revenues derived from inheritance taxes as between the Federal Government and the several States.

Mr. President, there has been very much controversy between the Federal Government and the States since the imposition of the Federal Government inheritance tax, growing out of the levies by the Federal Government and by the States. It has led in instances to a practical confiscation of the property of many estates. Even where there is a comparatively low State tax and a Federal tax imposed, where the property consists of real estate or of business plants, it is almost impossible to raise sufficient money to meet the taxes imposed by the State and the taxes imposed by the Federal Government. No estate can meet the exactions of both the Federal Government and the States unless its assets consist of money or stocks which have an available market value.

It does seem to me that the time has come when there must be some uniform method of levying estate taxes, and that there should be cooperation between the Federal Government and the States in the laying of these taxes. I have no doubt that in view of the controversy, which is so acute and so important, the States would not hesitate, indeed would be glad, to respond to the invitation extended by the President of the United States to appoint representatives to meet at a conference for the purpose of evolving some plan that would provide a just method of taxing estates and a just allocation of the funds derived therefrom to the Federal Government and to the States.

I believe that is the best solution of this vexatious and very important question. When this matter is disposed of I shall offer this amendment to the pending section or at the end of the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the question now is on the amendment to the committee amendment, as I understand it, which has just been offered, and I presume that should be voted upon after we have voted upon this proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota to the committee amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this amendment is one of the so-called "bloc" amendments. I have offered it on behalf of the chairman of the committee during his temporary absence. I have already stated my own views in reference to these taxes. The Senator from New York admits that we should levy a tax of this character for war purposes. If we can levy it for war purposes directly to raise revenue to carry on the war, I presume it is for war purposes to the same extent if it is to pay the debt for borrowed money to carry on the war; and as long as the debt continues I can see no reason why we should not levy the heavier tax. I would be very much inclined to think that in the case mentioned by the Senator from New York, where the tax is levied by the State, and also against the estate in the State where the decedent lives, and in other States, that in the State in which he lived there ought to be a credit for the taxes which are paid in other States; but inasmuch as that can not be handled by a Federal tax law, I would suggest to the Senator that if he wanted to reach that point it might be done by an amendment which would allow a credit for any taxes paid in any State upon the estate which is transferred through the death of the decedent. If the Senator would prepare an amendment of that kind, I say frankly that I would support it.

The Senator from New York has just come in, and I will repeat the statement. The Senator complains, and I think justly, that an estate in New York, for instance, not only has to pay the Federal tax, but has to pay taxes in the several States in which portions of the estate may be situated, and that this, added to the Federal tax, makes an exceedingly heavy tax. I agree with the Senator in that, and it seems to me that inasmuch as we can not legislate for the States and give the estate in New York the credit for any taxes paid in Wisconsin or Illinois, the tax that is paid by the estate of the decedent in any State or States ought to be deducted from the Federal taxes that are paid upon the same estate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Whether or not it is a tax of the State of his residence?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it should be, because it is really an estate tax, and it is duplicating the estate tax. Of course, I do not speak for anyone but myself, and the reason I suggest that is that I myself do not believe very strongly in Federal estate taxes. I think that is one domain which ought to be left, if possible, to the States themselves, as a means of raising revenue for running the State; but we have adopted it, we have adopted it as a war measure, we have adopted it because we needed the revenue; and we need the revenue to-day to pay the interest upon the war indebtedness.

If the Senator looks upon that part of the argument as worthy of consideration, he could prepare an amendment, if he thinks best.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator to mean that there shall be a credit for the State tax against the amount of money to be collected by the Federal Government?

Mr. McCUMBER. If we place as heavy a tax as is proposed by this amendment, then I think it would be perfectly fair that the amounts paid by any estate to the States should be deducted from the amount that would have to be paid to the Federal Government, especially in those cases where it runs as high as 50 per cent of the entire estate.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the suggestion is a very proper one, indeed, Mr. President; but, of course, it would not be equal in all States. One State may impose 10 per cent, one State 15, one 20, one 25, one 30. There would be that discrepancy in the payment of an inheritance tax by the individuals in different States.

Mr. McCUMBER. My idea would simply be to treat it as an expense the estate has to meet, and deduct it from the entire value of the estate.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, the gross value of the estate?

Mr. McCUMBER. The gross value of the estate. If the estate was worth $1,000,000, and it pays 10 per cent tax in one State, the net estate then would be worth only $900,000 on which we would base the Federal tax.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I misunderstood the Senator in the first instance.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I understood he had an amendment he was to offer to the estate-tax provision. If that is not so, I am willing to have a vote at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

So Mr. McCUMBER'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of line 15, page 148, strike out the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have some amendments to this title of the bill which I wish to offer and ask to have printed and lie upon the table. I shall offer them when the opportunity presents itself when the bill is in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer at this time two amendments which I ask to have printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that all the amendments be printed in the RECORD as well.

The amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 148, after line 17, insert the following:

"Provided, That in addition to taxes heretofore levied by this section a tax of 10 per cent shall be imposed upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred, issued by any State, county, or municipal authority, or authority other than that of the Federal Government, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess profits tax laws and which were issued prior to the passage of this act; and that upon such tax-exempt securities issued subsequent to the passage of this act the additional tax so levied shall be 15 per cent."

On page 148, after line 17, insert the following:

"Provided, That in addition to taxes heretofore levied by this section a tax of 10 per cent shall be imposed upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred, by whatsoever authority issued, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess profits tax laws, and which were issued prior to the passage of this act; and that upon such tax-exempt securities issued subsequent to the passage of this act the additional tax so levied shall be 15 per cent."

On page 150, line 15, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "five".

On page 153, line 1, after the word "administered" and the comma, strike out the remainder of the line and all the lines 2, 3, and 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "including State inheritance, legacy, succession, or estate taxes paid or payable in an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of the net estate computed without benefit of such deduction, but not including any income taxes upon income received after the death of the decedent" and a semicolon.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out all the matter beginning on page 146, line 22, down to and including line 17, page 148, and insert the following:

"SEC. 401. That, in lieu of the tax imposed by title 4 of the revenue act of 1918, a tax equal to the sum of the following percentages of the value of the net estate (determined as provided in sec. 403) is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States:

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have two amendments which relate to this general subject, but which are new matter. One seeks to impose an excise tax upon the estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this bill, and the other seeks to impose a tax upon tax-exempt securities when they pass through an estate.

I would like to ask unanimous consent that I may offer these amendments to-morrow, and that no objection will be raised because of the fact that I did not offer them while this section was pending. I think it is not necessary, anyway, for me to offer them under this section, but I desire to be sure that I may have the opportunity to offer them after the committee amendments have all been passed upon.

Mr. PENROSE. Why does not the Senator offer them now?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am prepared to offer them now, but they are a subject matter somewhat new that will lead to long discussion, and I thought we could pass upon matters in the bill that are not in controversy and perhaps eliminate a number of the smaller amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. The fact that the amendments will lead to a long discussion is an overwhelming and conclusive argument in my mind that we ought to proceed immediately to the consideration of them. So far as I understand the position of the suggested amendments, they are not in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the amendments are probably in order. I think there is some question whether they could not be offered after the committee amendments are disposed of, because they are new subject matter, but they relate to this general title in the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. If they are in order now, and the Chair so holds, I hope the Senator will submit them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am ready to proceed, and I am ready to stay here as long as the Senator from Pennsylvania is.

Mr. PENROSE. I am only too delighted to proceed when I am informed they may lead to discussion. I would much rather have the discussion now than to-morrow morning.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendments to the amendment.

(b) That in addition to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section, a tax equal to the following is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the gross estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States: 15 per cent of the amount, in excess of $50,000, which is included in gross estate because of the ownership of, or interest in, (a) the obligation of a State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia; or (b) securities issued under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act of July 17, 1916; or (c) the obligations of the United States or its possessions issued prior to September 1, 1917.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate for a moment, I desire to say that this amendment proposes to test the sincerity of the criticism that has been made against the wealthy investor in tax-exempt securities. Again and again during the discussion of this bill reference has been made to the evasion of our tax laws during the war and since the war by those who are possessed of extreme wealth investing in tax-exempt securities. We have folded our arms, stood here, and said, "Nothing can be done; it would be unconstitutional to attempt it; we can not reach them except by amending the Constitution." This amendment proposes to reach them not during the lifetime of the holder of the tax-exempt securities, but when such securities pass to his heirs as a part of his estate my amendment seeks to segregate them and to place a tax of 15 per cent, in addition to the regular estate tax, upon all tax-exempt securities.

I might talk for hours upon the merits of the amendment. It provides a method, a perfectly legitimate method, of imposing a tax upon securities of which the holder during his lifetime has received the benefit without paying any income tax. I do not know what opposition to this amendment there is upon the part of the committee. I might state that innumerable articles have been written on the subject. Only very recently the Saturday Evening Post contained a very illuminating article, which was entitled "Capital on strikes."

It cited the fact that capital was investing in tax-exempt securities in order to escape taxation and that the possessors of capital were making gifts to relatives for the purpose of avoiding the high surtaxes. The amendment offered by me affords an opportunity to "call" the strike and to impose a tax upon such tax-exempt securities when they become part of the estate of a deceased person; in other words, we can at least take the position of saying to the owner of tax-exempt securities, "You may escape during your lifetime the payment of taxes upon such securities, but when you bequeath or devise them to relatives or friends, then we propose to tax them."

Mr. SPENCER and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Missouri, he having first risen.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts be good enough to give me light upon this proposition in connection with his amendment? Suppose a man, for the benefit of his children—and that is his purpose in making the investment—invests $50,000 in tax-exempt securities. I presume there can be no doubt that under the law so long as he holds them he pays no taxes upon the income and any attempt to collect such taxes would be unconstitutional.

Now, do I understand that when that man dies and the purpose of his investment is about to be realized, namely, that his children shall have an income after his death, then the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to put as against the income of those children a 15 per cent tax upon the proceeds of those tax-exempt securities which their father purchased?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator's proposition correctly, the case he has cited will not be reached at all by my amendment——

Mr. SPENCER. Then, I misunderstood the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Because I have not proposed to change the exemption of $50,000 which is given to all estates. So if an estate consists of $50,000 of tax-exempt securities it would pay nothing. My amendment reaches only that class of estates over $50,000 which include tax-exempt securities. In substance, it amounts to this: That if an estate is made up of tax-exempt securities and is over $50,000 in value there shall be paid a larger estate tax upon it than if the estate had not been loaded up with tax-exempt securities.

I referred the other day to a communication which I had read from the New York Times, in which a leading resident of the city of New York, in discussing the pending revenue bill, referred to the fact that he had invested every single dollar he had, amounting to $500,000, in tax-exempt securities, and that he was now ready to let the politicians in Washington do what they pleased with the revenue bill.

The Secretary of the Treasury in stronger language than I could use has referred to the efforts which have been made by persons who have heretofore been paying surtaxes to escape taxation by two methods: Investing in tax-exempt securities and the making of gifts to relatives. There has been no effort made from the beginning to the end of the pending bill to stop those abuses, but every effort possible has been made to reduce the taxes of the very class that has been engaged in evading taxation. That is what the two amendments which I have proposed are intended to prevent.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not want to misunderstand the Senator from Massachusetts, and may I therefore repeat the question so as to ascertain whether or not I am right? Under his amendment if a man invests $100,000, $60,000 of it in general investments, which are subject to the inheritance tax, and $40,000 of it in tax-exempt securities for the benefit of his children, and when he dies leaves that $40,000 of tax-exempt securities to his children, am I not right in thinking that under the Senator's amendment the very moment those bonds come into the hands of the children or their guardian for the purpose for which their father invested the money, they then become subject for the first time to a 15 per cent tax?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator is correct. My amendment, in substance, says, "Your father has escaped paying taxes for years upon these securities; you are to escape paying taxes so long as you hold them; but when they pass from your father to you, then you shall pay a different tax than if the securities were other than tax exempt."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator answer a question with reference to the legal proposition involved? A State issues its bonds and by the law authorizing the issue provides that the bonds shall not be subject to tax in any form whatsoever. Does the Senator claim that the Federal Government can step in and impose an inheritance tax upon such bonds?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Federal Government at the present time imposes an inheritance tax upon tax-exempt securities.

Mr. McCUMBER. But Congress provides in the law under which certain Government securities are issued—for instance, in the case of some Liberty bonds—that they shall be free from all taxes except inheritance taxes; so that they are not free from that tax.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Not only is there a discrimination in favor of that class of bonds during the lifetime of their holders, but when they die and their estates are called upon to pay an estate tax, we say, "Instead of paying the full amount of money that everybody else has to pay under the estate tax, you can pay your tax bill with these tax-exempt securities."

Mr. McCUMBER. I am putting the question directly to the Senator, where the State provides by law for the issuance of State bonds, and it is provided in the law that the bonds shall be free from any character of taxation, can the Federal Government levy an inheritance tax upon such bonds?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no doubt about it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think the Federal Government can levy such a tax.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My inquiry and investigation have led me to come to that conclusion, but even were there a doubt about it, why not make an effort, why not now start the machinery to raise that constitutional question? How long are we going to sit here and denounce the escaping of taxes by those investing in tax-exempt securities and offer not a single constructive amendment to this bill or any other revenue bill to remedy that well-known abuse?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that we can denounce the States if we see fit to do so, but I have not denounced them. I think the States have a right to declare that their securities shall be free from taxation; and having that right, their bonds being valued according to whether or not they are free from taxation, I do not believe the Federal Government has the right to step in and say that a State bond free from taxation shall nevertheless pay a Federal tax, and if it is subject to a Federal tax at all the Federal taxing authority can levy a tax so heavy that it amounts to a confiscation, and therefore strikes at the very life of the State itself. I do not believe that can be done.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator was through. I want to be heard in my own right.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I simply wish to offer this suggestion, in view of what has been said: It seems to me that the tax provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is not a tax on the security itself; in other words, if bonds belonging to an estate pass into the hands of some one else they are still tax free, but the tax provided by the amendment is a tax on the corpus of the estate alone; in other words, it is a kind of an inheritance tax. We have a right to provide in advance that upon a given class of securities while in the hands of the estate the estate shall pay an additional tax. That is as I construe it, and I do not think that it is a tax upon the securities themselves.

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have the amendment read.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield for the purpose of having the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 146, line 22, after "section 401," it is proposed to insert "(a)," and on page 148, after line 17, to insert the following:

(b) That in addition to the tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section, a tax equal to the following is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the gross estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States: Fifteen per cent of the amount, in excess of $50,000, which is included in gross estate because of the ownership of, or interest in, (a) the obligation of a State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia; or (b) securities issued under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act of July 17, 1916; or (c) the obligations of the United States or its possessions issued prior to September 1, 1917.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I should not want to advance an opinion upon this matter by which I should be bound; but it seems to me that an investigation of the authorities will disclose, if I remember them correctly, that this is not a tax upon the bonds or the securities, but is a tax upon the right to take from the estate—in other words, a tax of the right to inherit—and that is the rule which the Supreme Court laid down in a case which I have in mind somewhat nebulously at this time, but I think I am correct. That is the basis of an inheritance tax—that it does not reach the securities at all. It is simply a tax upon the right to inherit.

As I say, I do not want to pass upon that matter absolutely at this time, but I am satisfied that I can find, in a short time, the authorities in support of it.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the Senator from Idaho is right, that we have a right to tax even a tax-exempt security when the effect of our tax is thus to tax a tax-exempt security under the guise of a tax upon inheritance. Any man has a right to devise or bequeath his property to anyone else, and upon the devise or bequest we can fix any tax that we like; but the inequality of this amendment is manifest from this illustration:

If two men have $50,000 of tax-exempt securities, and one of them gives those securities on the eve of death to his children who are in his bedroom, they never can be taxed in the hands of those children, because there has been no devise or bequest. There has been a gift.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator that the amendment which I am next to offer covers exactly that situation and provides for a tax upon gifts during lifetime.

Mr. SPENCER. I doubt very much if the Senator can draw an amendment which will stand the constitutional test to make a tax-exempt security taxable in the hands of anybody as a security. He can tax the devise, he can tax the bequest, he can tax the right to inherit; but when any man gets those tax-exempt securities in his hands, not by a bequest, I doubt very much if the Senator from Massachusetts can draw any amendment that will constitutionally tax them.

Mr. BORAH. I think the vice of the Senator's argument consists in the fact that the state of facts which he gives would not take the party from under the inheritance law. It has been held over and over again that if a gift is made in contemplation of death, with the idea or purpose of evading administration upon the estate, and so forth, it comes within the law taxing inheritances.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I know that well enough. I know that no man can make on his deathbed a gift that is conditioned upon death and is to be revoked in case he does not die, but that was not my illustration.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not one that is to be revoked if he does not die, but in contemplation of death, in the expectation of death, he gives something to his children, hands it to them, or hands a deed to his wife. It is an inheritance, whether he dies or not, or whether there was any understanding that he was to take it back in case he did not die.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, in my judgment the Senator is wrong.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I may be.

Mr. SPENCER. If the time ever comes—which I hope will be many, many years in the future—when the Senator finds death coming and wants to give something——

Mr. BORAH. I will not have anything to give.

Mr. SPENCER. As an absolute, unconditional gift on his deathbed, and passes the physical property over and says, "This is yours," independent of his life or death, that gift is as valid as if it were made 10 years before death.

Mr. BORAH. The gift is perfectly valid.

Mr. LODGE. That is prohibited in some States.

Mr. SPENCER. Not in Missouri. It may be in Massachusetts. If it is, I am not informed of it. There are some States that prohibit a gift within a certain number of days before death for charitable purposes; but an actual gift before death is not measured by hours or by days.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not contend that the gift would be void. What I contend is that it would pass under the rule of inheritance and be subject to a tax.

Mr. SPENCER. Then the gift, as a gift, is void.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no. The party takes over the property, but he pays a tax, if it is in contemplation of death, just the same.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator from Idaho is right, the tax is upon a gift and not upon a bequest. You can not tax the gift if the gift is a tax-exempt security. You can tax the bequest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am in sympathy with the Senator's amendment, but I should like to know whether it would not be evaded in this way—whether a man could not organize a company for the purpose of holding tax-free securities, so that when he died he would devise and will to his heirs or to his children devisees the stock in that company?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it is quite possible that there can be evasions of this amendment in operation, as there can be evasions of other provisions of this law.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that that can not be cured by any amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have nothing more to say before yielding the floor, except that it seems to me the amendment gives us an opportunity to provide that tax-exempt securities shall, when passing through an estate, yield some revenue.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is a principle of English law as broad as English law itself, it is a principle of equity as broad as equity itself, that no human being has the right to do indirectly that which he has no right to do directly.

If it be true that the Federal Government has no right to tax State securities and the securities of political subdivisions of States directly, it has no right to tax them indirectly. If it can not tax them in re, it can not tax them as a part of a man's income, nor can it tax them as a part of a dead man's savings, nor as a part of a live man's inheritance.

I do not care what the particular line betwixt the nor' and nor'west side may be as to that being decided by some court or other under the interpretation of some lawyer or other. That principle runs all through English jurisprudence, in Great Britain, in the United States, in Canada, in New Zealand, in Australia, and even in South Africa.

Mr. President, it was decided in the case of McCulloch against Maryland that a State could not tax the securities or the fiscal agencies of the Federal Government, because if it had the power to tax them it had the power to destroy them, and if it had the power to destroy them one of our dual forms of government could do away with the other.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, nobody doubts that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When we had the agricultural bank loan bill up I went to the Senator then in charge of the bill, the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Hollis, and I said: "If you will put in that bill a declaration that these farm-loan banks are fiscal agencies of the Federal Government, then you can issue their bonds tax free, and unless you do that there is some question about it"; but the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that neither of our dual forms of government can tax the fiscal agencies of the other, because with the power of taxation goes the power of destruction.

The first decision was declared in favor of the Federal Government against the State. There are some few Senators over on this side of the Chamber yet, maybe about 6, possibly 12, who still continue to believe that the States are political entities and mean something, and that they are not mere subordinate political divisions of the Federal Government. Unless you are prepared to surrender that doctrine you will vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, because if you can once begin to tax, under the pretense of inheritance, State bonds and State securities and State fiscal agencies and instrumentalities, then you can begin to do it under the guise of taxing income, and then you can begin to tax the securities themselves, because there is no distinction in principle between the three things.

One other word, Mr. President.

A great deal has been said about men investing money in tax-free securities in order to avoid taxation. What have they done after they have been proven guilty of what you charge?

For example, last week I sent a little, miserable $3,500—most of you Senators would spend it at a ball or at a banquet if you felt like it; you would not feel that it amounted to much—but I sent it to buy some farm loan bank bonds, because I thought that was the best that my poor little $3,500 could do for the farmers of the country. I could get the bond, and farm-loan banks could loan them the money, and out of the lending they could do something, maybe, if they had the ability to do it, and I sent it. Those bonds were issued tax-free, as fiscal instrumentalities of the Federal Government. Suppose the State stepped into the arena and wanted to tax those bonds: Is there one of you here that would allow the State of Massachusetts or the State of Mississippi to do it? And if there is not one of you that would allow a State to tax Federal instrumentalities, why should you, being first citizens of a State and afterwards citizens of the Federal Government, permit the secondary government to do what they deny the primary Government the right to do?

Mr. President, I am getting a little tired of ascertaining, little by little, that a State is a sort of county in the Federal Union; that it does not amount to much more in Washington than a county in Iowa does in the capital of Iowa. It does seem to me that we do not stand here alone as representatives of the citizenship of the United States in the aggregate as a Federal Union, but that we also stand here as citizens of our several States, and that we ought to insist upon their rights just as much as upon the power of the United States Government. Of course, whenever it comes to a question between their respective powers, the War of 1861–1865 settled the question as to whether the States must go down or the Federal Government should go down, whether it was right or whether it was wrong, but still there ought to be some few of us left, and we are going to stand by the rights of the States, whatever rights are left, regardless of the question of whether they can be overpowered or not, and the States have certain rights.

It was proposed in the Committee on Finance at one time to tax the salaries of State officials, that the Federal Government should tax the incomes they received as State officials. Luckily Massachusetts and Mississippi stood side by side at that time. Luckily, I say, because Massachuetts is generally wrong. But at that time we stood side by side, at any rate. Suppose that had been agreed to. If the Federal Government, in its omnipotence, in its sublimity, could tax the State governor and all the other officials 100 per cent of their salaries, it would put the State out of business. There is not a man here ass enough, unpatriotic enough, to confess that a State would have a right to tax the President of the United States any percentage whatsoever of his salary.

If this grand experiment of ours—and thus far it is an experiment, it has not proven itself successful—if this grand Federal Government of ours, which is an experiment upon the surface of the earth, is to succeed at all, it must succeed upon the theory that neither of the dual parts can destroy the other by taxing it out of existence.

When the War between the States occurred they settled the issue that neither could destroy the other by arms, or at any rate that the States could not destroy the Federal Government, and that the Federal Government could only partially destroy the State; but I return to the old principle, that whenever a man or a nation or a representative assembly can not do directly it can not do in foro concientiae indirectly, and I do not care how many votes might be gained by that sort of proposition, how much antagonism might be aroused against the very rich, to which class, thank God, I do not belong; and I purposely say thank God because I would not belong to it if I could.

Whatever may be done here in the shape of argument directed to individual prejudice or intelligence, whichever it may be, I call upon this body to stop, look, and listen before it adopts an amendment which will confer upon the Federal Government the power indirectly to extinguish the financial instrumentalities of a State or of a political subdivision of a State. You tell me the people will escape taxes. I might say I do not care; I do care, but I care more for the other thing than I do for that; and, by the way, they do not escape as much taxation as you would suppose.

Suppose my State wants to issue a bond, and suppose with the Federal taxes upon the income derived from that bond or the inheritance of it when it passes from father to child it could float that bond at nothing less than 7 per cent, and suppose that with tax exemptions it could float it at 4½ per cent.

That difference of 2½ per cent would be saved to the people who have to pay that bond, and it is equal to a tax of 2½ per cent uniformly levied for the benefit of any treasury, anywhere, belonging to the people, whether that treasury be in Washington, in Minneapolis, or in Jackson, Miss.

It is better than levying a tax; and why do I say that? Because if you levy a tax of 2½ per cent you would have to pay somebody to collect it, and you would lose that much. The very best saving to the people that can be conceived of is the dollar left in the citizen's pocket. There is no deduction from that; but when you levy a tax and maintain expensive machinery to collect it there is a deduction of somewhere from 5 to 50 per cent, depending upon the efficiency of the machinery and the character of the tax.

It would be better if you would leave in the pockets of the citizens of my State 2½ per cent which they would not have to pay in the shape of interest upon necessary public obligations, to build public roads, to pay their State officers, to compensate for damages on account of State accidents, to do all sorts of things that are governmentally necessary; and remember, in connection with that, that the State does nine things where the Federal Government does one, because the State takes care of education, it takes care of public roads, it takes care of the levees, it takes care of the bridges, it takes care of ordinary criminal jurisdiction, and everything of that sort.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was about to make the point which the Senator has been making, and much better than I could have made it, but I want to suggest to him another objection to this, that it impairs the obligation of a contract. It must be apparent to everybody that when the Federal Government issues a tax-exempt bond the Government could not thereafter tax that bond without impairing the obligation of the contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The same thing applies to a State bond.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall not enter into that, because while there is some dispute as to whether the Government can or can not do various things which are very close to violating or impairing a contract, there might be a good deal of dispute about it; but equity and justice and the ethics of it are along the line of suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, where the strict technical law is not.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate talking about nothing. I suppose this is not going to be agreed to, because even if it were right, the majority party has decided that it should fail, I think; but, at the same time, I want to enter my voice, 67 years of age a few days ago, against any further usurpation of power by the Federal Government which threatens to put the States and their political institutions out of existence.

You may say whatever you please, we worship the flag in all its glory, we talk about the Union, we speak of the unity of the Nation, and we do everything else, but I tell you that the grandeur and glory of civilization of this country is founded upon the United States in the plural, not upon the Federal Government as a representative of these United States.

This is merely an experiment so far, but the greatness and the hope of this country are founded upon the old English principle of local self-government, in so far as local self-government is competent to deal with the subject matters committed to it, and it is competent to deal with every local question. Our greatness and our glory are as much in New York and in Massachusetts and in Virginia and in South Carolina and in Connecticut and in Mississippi as in the President and the Congress of the United States. You can get along without the Federal Government; it is not absolutely necessary. Different parts of the country would travel along the best they could. Most of them have the old common sense of the English-speaking people and the old principles of the English-speaking man's common law left with them. They could get along; but the Federal Government could not get along without the States, and the principle of local self-government and the laws of every English-bred and Scotch-bred and Welsh-bred and Irish-bred man in the world is home rule.

I can not for the life of me, even for the nonce, even theoretically, permit to pass any attack upon the innate, inherent, and original sovereignty of the States, especially with regard to their taxing power, which has been proven by all the history of the English-speaking race to be the real power which inheres in any form of government, without making my objection to it, and I hope that no Democrat will vote for it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have a theory regarding these taxes which are now being discussed perhaps somewhat different from that advanced by the committee or by anyone who has discussed the subject.

If we go back to elementary principles it seems to me this bill and its proposals rest upon an unsound foundation. The very name of this provision is to me contrary to what logic would suggest. It is called an estate tax. I do not believe that the Federal Government should ever levy an estate tax. The transference of property from ancestor to his descendants is wholly a question of State law. It is a matter which depends entirely upon the laws of inheritance of the various States. But the Federal Government has a right, under the Constitution, to tax incomes. It seems to me that for the Federal Government to levy what is called an estate tax is violative of the fundamental principles which govern the law of inheritance and the constitutional amendment which permits us to tax incomes.

There is only one logical way to deal with this subject, and that is to treat incomes from estates as income. Call it an inheritance tax if you will, but it is not in the strict sense of that term. It should be a tax upon incomes derived through inheritances, under the constitutional amendment.

I submit, if Senators please, that that is the only authority which the Federal Government possesses. Such income derived through inheritance should be treated as a special class of income and a tax levied accordingly. But it is through the State laws that inheritances are permitted at all. How and by what right should the Federal Government tax something which is brought into being solely and only by reason of a State law? Let the States retain their inheritance laws, their estate taxes. What the Federal Government has a right to put its hand on is income the heirs may receive. I submit that that is the only true principle which should govern legislation of this kind and that anything which we may call an estate tax is not warranted by the Constitution of the United States and has no correct foundation in morals or in rights of property. We have a right to deal with what comes to the heir through inheritance as income, a separate class of income, but we have no right to invade the domain of the State under whose authority only the right of inheritance is permitted. I submit that this whole title of the bill is founded upon an incorrect principle.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it not true that long before we had any constitutional right to levy a tax upon income the Supreme Court had decided that we had a right to levy a tax upon inheritance?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator from Iowa is right in that, but what I am dealing with is the substance and not the technicality of the law. While we may have the right under the decisions of the Supreme Court to tax the conveyance of property and so on, as the Senator has suggested, in its last analysis what we seek to do is to tax the incomes of the citizens of the United States. We are not relegated to any mere technicality of the law, but the substance of it is that we do and are proposing by this bill to tax incomes of individuals derived through inheritance. It seems to me that that should be the fundamental principle on which our whole legislation of this kind should be founded.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I shall wait until the Senator has concluded. I wish to read a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me, in connection with one statement made by the Senator from Iowa, to ask that Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Supreme Court, however, did not decide, as I recall, that the Federal Government in taxing inheritances had the right to tax that part of the estate which consisted of tax-exempt securities.

Mr. CUMMINS. The question was not before the Supreme Court in the particular case, as I remember it, but if that objection is tenable or valid, then the present law is unconstitutional. We now tax estates, or, as the Senator from New Mexico prefers to call them, incomes from ancestors composed partly of tax-free securities. Our law at the present time makes no distinction between tax-free securities and other forms of property, and we are, and for some years have been, levying a tax upon estates composed in part of securities issued by the various State governments and municipalities, so that the criticism which is now levied against this general subject is a criticism upon the law as it stands.

The only thing the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to do is to discriminate between the tax-free securities and other forms of property, and levy a larger tax upon the tax-free securities than is levied by the law upon other forms of estate property.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. WATSON of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. In the case of Pollock against Farmers Loan & Trust Co., 157 United States Reports, 585, the court said:

> It is contended that although the property or revenues of the States or their instrumentalities can not be taxed, nevertheless the income derived from State, county, and municipal securities can be taxed. But we think the same want of power to tax the property or revenues of the States or their instrumentalities exists in relation to a tax on the income from their securities, and for the same reason, and that reason is given by Chief Justice Marshall in Weston v. Charleston (2 Pet., 449, 468) where he said: "The right to tax the contract to any extent, when made, must operate upon the power to borrow before it is exercised, and have a sensible influence on the contract. The extent of this influence depends on the will of a distinct government. To any extent, however inconsiderable, it is a burthen on the operations of government. It may be carried to an extent which shall arrest them entirely. * * * The tax on Government stock is thought by this court to be a tax on the contract, a tax on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and consequently to be repugnant to the Constitution." Applying this language to these municipal securities, it is obvious that taxation on the interest therefrom would operate on the power to borrow before it is exercised, and would have a sensible influence on the contract, and that the tax in question is a tax on the power of the States and their instrumentalities to borrow money and consequently repugnant to the Constitution.

That is as clearly as possible a holding that such a tax as my colleague proposes is unconstitutional.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] if he does not consider a bond as much of a contract as a charter? He will remember the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dartmouth College case, where it was held that even an English charter could not be changed by American law. There are lawyers who hold that a charter, being a mere license that may not be exercised, is not so much of a contract as a bond which a man buys and accepts from the State upon the terms stated on the face of that bond. My question is, Does not the Senator think that a law of this sort would impair the contract?

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer to that is, of course, the one given by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that this is not a tax upon securities, it is not an imposition upon the contract, but it is a tax upon the right of an ancestor to transfer by his death property to his descendants.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is the point the Senator from New Mexico is arguing so ably now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The point I would like to have the Senate consider is that if we deal with the subject from the standpoint of income we obviate the necessity for considering any of the questions which have been suggested by the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator from Georgia. It is perfectly apparent that the heir who receives anything from his ancestor receives an income. There is no common law which transfers from the ancestor to the heir any property. It all comes either from an act of Parliament or from the acts of the legislatures of our various States, but there is one thing which stands out undisputed, and that is that the heir has an income, and the amendment to our Constitution provides that the Federal Government may tax incomes from whatever source received.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from New Mexico to infer that I am disputing his proposition. I quite agree with him that the property that comes to an heir by either gift or devise, or no matter how, might be treated as income, just exactly as the increase in the value of property when it is sold is counted as income. My notion is that it is a stretch of the imagination to call it income; but, nevertheless, we do treat it as income, and I see no reason why the property that comes to the heir from his ancestors should not be treated as income. That is not the way we have been treating it for the last six or seven or eight years, however.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The purpose of my rising at this time is to start the thought, if I may, that the present law and the proposed bill rest upon an unsound foundation. What we should do is not to put a tax upon the estates, but to put a tax upon the inheritances or the incomes which the heirs receive, and whenever we change the foundation on which this law is based we come nearer doing justice to the citizens of this country.

"Put a tax upon the estates." What does that mean? If there is only one heir, that entire tax is put upon him. If there are six heirs, it is first taken out of the estate. This estate tax is based upon the amount of the estate. It is a graduated tax upon the estate; but when, owing to the condition of the family, the number of heirs is multiplied, an unequal tax is levied upon those heirs. Each one of the half dozen heirs is being taxed at the same rate as we would tax one if there were only one heir, although it is supposed that there is a graduated tax upon inheritances.

I submit that the present law, which I opposed in the Finance Committee, and the perpetuation of which is proposed by the pending bill, is based upon a wrong foundation. We should consider inheritances as individual incomes. We may have a graduated tax upon them as incomes, and which they will bear equally, but whenever we undertake to place a graduated tax upon the estate—the total fund to be distributed—we are violating the principle of equal taxation. It is wrong. It is a wrong foundation. We should not call it an estate tax. It should not be an estate tax. It should be an income tax; but inasmuch as it all comes in at one time perhaps it should be considered differently from other incomes.

Under the bill as proposed by the committee—and a very wise proposal, I believe—we provide that when real estate is sold, if through the passage of the years it has increased in value by a considerable amount when the property is sold, we only consider 40 per cent of the increase as income for the year. We make a special rate of taxation for that, and there is no reason why we should not have a special rate of taxation to apply to incomes which are derived from estates. When we do that we are upon an absolutely firm foundation. We then put that tax upon those who have the ability to pay, and we equalize the tax as between heirs where there are half a dozen of one estate and one of another estate. We can not escape it.

I desire to emphasize now this proposition. I do not know how long it will be before the Congress will come to accept it, but it must come to it, just as certain as the sun rises in the morning, that it is unfair for the Federal Government to levy any tax upon an estate as such. We should levy it upon income derived from estates and put such income in a special class, because it is specially circumstanced and is different from other income. By doing that we will do absolute justice as between the various citizens of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there can be no doubt about the justice of the last statement made by the Senator from New Mexico if it were taken with limitations. It is absolutely true that income from inheritances should be taxed just like income from anything else, but within certain limits. Income from State bonds is not taxable by the Federal Government, and therefore an inheritance of interest from the income of State bonds is also not taxable by the Federal Government; in other words, every properly taxable income ought to be taxed equally and every improperly taxed income ought not to be taxed at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit the suggestion that even where there are tax-exempt bonds in an estate, whenever they are transferred to the heirs they become income, regardless of the kind of securities they are? We do not tax them because they are tax-exempt securities but we tax them because the heir inherits or acquires such bonds as income.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico now suggests that, although we might not have a right as a Federal Legislature to tax inheritances, we might have the right to tax the instrumentalities of a State government as a part of an income. It has already been decided long ago that we had no right to tax a part of a man's income from State or Territorial bonds or bonds of the subdivisions of a State or Territory or from bonds of any State fiscal agency. So the Senator from New Mexico has gone beyond the decision to suppose a case that might exist somewhere but never has existed thus far. If Congress has no right to tax my bonds of the State of Mississippi which I hold—I say "my bonds" although I do not hold a single bond of the State of Mississippi, but suppose I did—then Congress has no right to tax my income from such bonds and there is no right to tax my inheritance in them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is different.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Senator's entire argument fails right there, because he is attempting to make a distinction between an income derived from the thing itself and the inheritance derived from the thing itself.

Mr. President, with the latter part of the speech which the Senator from New Mexico has made I am in cordial agreement, and I have twice expressed that agreement upon this floor. Originally in the Committee on Finance I objected to the idea that an estate should be taxed by the amount of money that the dead man left; I contended that it ought to be taxed by the amount of money that the live man inherited; in other words, I have never believed that the Congress of the United States, even after the Civil War, had acquired the right to tax the dead who had died and gone over to hell, purgatory, or heaven; they have the right to tax only the living.

Here is a man who lies down and dies, leaving an estate of $150,000; he leaves it to 10 children, who get $15,000 apiece. Here is another man who lies down and dies, leaving an estate of $150,000, and he leaves it to one child, who gets $150,000; or he leaves it to a nunnery or a monkery and it gets $150,000; or he leaves it to the Philanthropic Dog Society, which keeps dogs from dying unduly while unmuzzled in large cities, and that society gets $150,000. According to every principle of right and ethics and right thinking, such a tax ought to be levied upon the man who gets the money and not upon the man who leaves the money. The man who leaves the money ought to be left to account to God or St. Peter or somebody else for it, while the man to whom he leaves the money ought to be allowed to account to the United States or the States for getting it. That is a different proposition.

Now, when the man with the $150,000 lies down and dies, under this bill he is taxed—I have forgotten the amount, but it does not matter; we will call "X," an unknown quantity. Then each one of the 10 heirs pay "X," whereas if each one of the heirs paid only upon what that heir got each one would pay one-tenth of "X."

Let me assume another case. Down in Mississippi a man who dies leaving an estate of $150,000 is accounted comparatively rich; in Georgia, outside of Atlanta or Savannah, he is accounted as being exceedingly wealthy. Suppose an ordinary Mississippian or Georgian dies and leaves $20,000.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The boll weevil would get half of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the boll weevil would get half of it; but he dies possessed of an estate of $20,000 and leaves it to 10 children, each child who only gets $1,000 has to pay something like 30 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The rate on an estate of $150,000 is 2 per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whatever may be the rate, the principle underlying it is the same, that the dead man is taxed and not the live man; the man who left his money and not the man who receives it; the one unable to pay it because he was already buried is the measure of obligation to the Federal Government, while the man who is able to pay it, if he is able because he is alive, is not the measure of the obligation to the Federal Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement regarding one thought which the Senator from Mississippi has just expressed. He very wisely says that if we can not tax a Federal security we can not tax the income from it; I think that is true; but so far as the question before the Senate is concerned it is not a question of taxing the income from Federal securities, but it is a question of taxing the income of the heir by reason of his inheritance. The income in that case is not the income of the Federal security but it is the Federal security itself. The whole thing is income, so far as the heir is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will be very glad to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the interest of historical accuracy I desire to complete a statement which I started but did not finish. After offering a proposition to the Senate Committee on Finance to regulate inheritance taxes by the amount received and not by the amount left, it went through the committee and then went through the Senate; but it failed in conference because a very democratic southern Representative, who seemed to think that anything above $100,000 was taboo, insisted so much upon its failing that it did fail.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I just wish to say one word further only, and that is this: I think the Congress has a perfect right to do just what is proposed by this bill, but I think that the bill conveys a wrong impression as to what should be done. I hope at some time this provision of the revenue bill will not be called "an estate tax," but "income from estates" or an "inheritance tax," or something of that sort. I think it is founded upon a wrong principle. If we ever once get into our minds that this is really and properly a tax upon the income of the heirs, we are then on a firm and just foundation. Any tax upon an estate as such brings about an inequality. I have no doubt of the validity of the proposal of the committee, but I do hope that in the near future we will call it something else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to have the RECORD show the attitude of some of the extremely wealthy citizens of this country in regard to investments in tax-exempt securities. I desire to quote from a statement made by Otto H. Kahn, published recently in a New York paper. He says:

> From the merely selfish standpoint the man of means need have little quarrel with the existing schedule of surtaxes. If he chooses to avail himself of the lawful opportunities at hand, he can invest a greater or less portion, and in some cases, all of his capital in tax-exempt securities at an attractive rate of interest, and to the extent that he does so the income tax and surtaxes will cease to trouble him.

Again——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator will wait until I place in the RECORD some further quotations, I will be glad to yield. I now quote from an article in the Saturday Evening Post of recent date, which discusses at great length the whole question of tax-exempt securities.

The article states, among other things:

> It is impossible to say exactly how many totally tax-exempt securities there are or to exactly what extent the large incomes have been converted into them. The volume of such securities has been estimated as high as $16,000,000,000. It is certainly increasing at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year. As to the extent to which the rich have converted their incomes into these securities, upon which of course it is unnecessary to pay any income tax whatever, no one can say, because the amount of such securities still owned by savings banks and other similar institutions can not be stated with any degree of preciseness.
> Dr. Adams, economic expert to the Treasury Department, has stated that in his opinion the volume of exempt securities is "quite sufficient for the wealthy men to invest nearly their entire fortunes." Other experts differ radically from this view; but it might be noted that Congressman McFADDEN, chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, has stated that by 1922 the process of conversion into exempt securities on the part of the very large incomes will have gone so far that they will be scot-free from taxes.
> This much is certain: Practically every broker and bond or investment dealer has gone into municipals. The financial pages of the newspapers contain far more offerings of municipal bonds than of any other variety, and even persons with means so moderate that tax exemption is no benefit receive by mail two or three offerings of such securities daily. New issues of municipals are being put out every day.
> One of the country's richest men, already quoted at length, told me that the people he knew were converting at a steadily increasing rate. I objected that many rich men could not put their property into sufficiently liquid form to sell, but he replied by saying that though that was entirely true of one year, there had now been four years in which to make the change. The first year or two, he said, rich men decided to hang on, thinking the taxes would not last, but that by now everyone is doing it.
> The investment manager of one of the largest fortunes said that he no longer buys any securities whatever except exempts, and added, "If we are in this position, others of like means must be."
> I objected that the volume of exempt securities, even if around $16,000,000,000, hardly seemed large enough to me to permit of so many of the very large incomes seeking refuge therein. He replied that the great fortunes had been able to get all they want, because the active, successful business men on incomes of say $50,000 to $100,000 a year had been very slow about coming into the exempt market.

This is conclusive proof that the extremely wealthy class have been the worst offenders—if I may use the word "offenders"—in resorting to the practice of evading the tax laws of the country by investing in tax-exempt securities.

I also want to offer for the RECORD a communication which was recently published in the New York Times by a citizen of New York, who boasts of the fact that he has converted his entire estate into tax-exempt securities.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRANSFERS HIS FORTUNE.

To the Editor of the New York Times:

I have just completed transferring my entire fortune of $550,000 into tax-exempt bonds netting me 5 per cent, and now feel that I don't care what the politicians at Washington do to the taxpayers. Owing to the preelection promises of both Republican and Democratic Parties to reduce the cost of Government and taxes, I held off for a while, to see what our "statesmen" were going to do after they got into office. Now I am convinced that the taxpayer will get no relief from the present lot at Washington, and have made up my mind to take no chances in any business with my capital. If you engage in any business and happen to make good Uncle Sam is a preferred partner; if you lose Uncle Sam shares not in your losses. That the taxpayers of this and other countries stand so meekly for all this outrageous taxation is a mystery to me.

If the taxpayers were organized, like the farmers or the workers, perhaps there might be a taxpayers' bloc as well as a farmers' or labor-union bloc. One thing is sure, however, there will be no "good times" or full dinner pails in the country as long as we have surtaxes and profit taxes.

Any man who would risk his capital and contribute his time and energy to make money, and then have to give up to the Government from one-third to a half of his earnings, ought to have his head examined.

READER.

NEW YORK, October 12, 1921.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am offering no new constitutional question here in regard to the levying of an estate tax by the National Government. I am not discussing whether or not it is a wise thing to do. I am not even discussing whether or not the rates are larger than they ought to be. An estate tax now exists; and tax-exempt securities, like every other security when they pass into that estate, are taxed under the provisions of the present law.

There is one objection that can be made to my amendment, and a serious one. It is that it is discriminatory. It is discriminatory because the holders of these tax-exempt securities have themselves been discriminating against the Government in seeking to invest disproportionately their fortunes in tax-exempt securities. I recognize the force of that objection—that it seeks to place a special tax upon tax-exempt securities—but who has suggested any other way? Who has named or intimated any other manner in which something could be done to prevent the converting of the great fortunes of America into tax-exempt securities and permitting the tax burdens to be borne by the poorer classes and the great middle classes of our people?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe it would be enlightening if the Senator would state at this time what the present law is, and what his amendment proposes, and in a very brief way why he proposes the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I thought I had explained the amendment. First of all, I will say this:

My amendment does not affect the estate of any man, woman, or child that does not amount to $50,000. That is the first proposition. No tax-exempt security is reached by my amendment in any estate of less than $50,000. I am accepting the fundamental proposition that all estates of less than $50,000 shall be exempt from an estate tax. When these larger estates of over $50,000 become subject to our present estate-tax laws, my amendment provides that in addition to the present estate tax the tax-exempt securities shall be segregated, counted, tabulated, and an additional flat tax of 15 per cent put upon those securities.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is one thing that I am curious to know. I am not combating this amendment; but three or four years ago we denounced everybody who would not buy Government securities, and now we turn around and denounce everybody who buys them. We ought to be consistent. We ought either to say that it is wrong to issue these tax-exempt securities and that we will not do it, or we ought not to denounce the man who purchases them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But does not the Senator think there is a different situation when tax-exempt securities fall into an estate——

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I do not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And they have been exempted during the lifetime of the holder, and are to be exempted during the lifetime of the beneficiary?

Mr. CARAWAY. I think it infinitely better that a man who has a large fortune, and therefore is not able to manage it well and leave it actively at work, shall buy tax-exempt securities, than to go around and compel, as we did, everybody to borrow money to buy them. The Government has to have some means of existence. I do not believe, to start in with, that large fortunes are seeking tax-exempt securities, because the securities are going down all the time. They are seeking a market, and can not find it; but if they do find it, either they ought to be exempt from taxes, as we said they should be, or else we ought to repeal that provision of law under which we issued those securities. It seems to me to be monstrous to denounce a man because he will not buy, and then to penalize him if he buys.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have nothing further to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the other day, when the question was under consideration of allowing as a deduction the rate of interest paid upon tax-exempt securities held by a taxpayer, I made the statement upon the floor of the Senate that the Government itself, in appealing to the people to purchase these tax-exempt bonds, had specifically promised the American people that if they would buy those bonds the rate of interest upon any money borrowed to carry them could be deducted as an exemption. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] challenged that statement. I well remembered the circulars sent from one end of this country to the other making that statement, and I promised the Senator from Missouri that I would send to the Treasury Department and have a copy of the circular sent to me, and I would place it in the RECORD.

I now have a photostatic copy of the letter sent out by the Treasury Department, in which they appeal to the American people to buy 3¾ per cent Victory notes, and in that appeal they specifically state that the amount of interest that is paid upon loans to carry those notes shall be allowed as an exemption.

I ask unanimous consent, as a part of my statement, to print in the RECORD paragraph D from this appeal, which is entitled, "Tax Exemption Features in Connection with the Victory Liberty Loan Campaign," issued by the Government Loan Organization, Second Federal Reserve District Liberty Loan Committee, 120 Broadway, New York City.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the matter will go into the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

D. ADVANTAGE FROM DEDUCTIBILITY OF CARRYING CHARGES.

For the purpose of computing net income subject to income and excess-profits taxes, all interest paid or accrued within the taxable year is deductible from gross income, except interest on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry tax-exempt securities other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917. It is therefore permissible for a purchaser of either the 3¾ per cent or the 4¼ per cent notes to borrow the purchase price and deduct interest paid from his gross income without being subject to any tax upon the income received from 3¾ per cent notes so purchased and carried, and without being subject to the normal tax upon the income received from 4¼ per cent notes so purchased and carried. This applies to corporations liable to excess-profits tax as well as to individuals liable to surtax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Smoot
Borah	Gerry	McKinley	Stanfield
Brandegee	Gooding	McLean	Sterling
Bursum	Hale	McNary	Sutherland
Calder	Harreld	Moses	Townsend
Capper	Harris	Myers	Trammell
Caraway	Harrison	New	Wadsworth
Cummins	Heflin	Newberry	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Warren
Dial	Keyes	Oddie	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Lenroot	Overman	Watson, Ind.
du Pont	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
Edge	McCormick	Shortridge	Willis
France	McCumber	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I merely want to say that I would like very much to vote for this amendment. I am quite sure that something of the kind ought to be done, but I am not convinced that it is constitutional, and I feel that I must vote against it on constitutional grounds. If it could be made clear that it was constitutional, if authority from our Supreme Court had been adduced showing that it was constitutional, I think I should vote for it; but without such a showing, believing, as I do, that it is not constitutional, I shall have to vote against it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. As I will have an opportunity to offer the amendment in the Senate again, I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote at this time.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to section 401 as amended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I regret at this time to have to trouble the Senate to listen to the consideration of another amendment to the amendment which I now offer and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before proceeding with the reading, I would like to ascertain whether or not that is a matter pertinent to the particular section now under consideration. As I understand it, under the agreement any amendment offered should apply to a section which is being considered by the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should be glad and grateful to the Senator if he would agree that I might offer it later, at another stage.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. I simply want to have the Senate follow the rule we have adopted with reference to disposing of amendments.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. With that understanding, then, I will not press the amendment at this time, with the understanding that I may offer it after the committee amendments are finished.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to section 401 as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there was an amendment passed over, I think, on page 128.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the three amendments which Senator LA FOLLETTE intends to discuss this evening begin on page 125, and include the one on page 128. I suppose he wants to take up all three of the amendments. I thought he was coming into the Chamber at this time, but if not, we can go on with the other amendments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well, Mr. President; if those may be passed over, the Secretary may proceed with the next.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee proposes on page 176 to strike out, beginning with line 4, the remainder of the page, as follows:

SEC. 601. Subdivision (a) of section 600 of the revenue act of 1918 is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a colon and the following: "Provided, That on all distilled spirits on which tax is paid at the nonbeverage rate of $2.20 per proof gallon and which are diverted to beverage purposes or for use in the manufacture or production of any article used or intended for use as a beverage, there shall be levied and collected an additional tax of $4.20 on each proof gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon, to be paid by the person responsible for such diversion."

SEC. 602. Section 605 of the revenue act of 1918 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The process of extraction of water from high-proof spirits for the production of absolute alcohol shall not be deemed to be rectification within the meaning of section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, and absolute alcohol shall not be subject to the tax imposed by this section, but the production of such absolute alcohol shall be under such regulation as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe."

SEC. 603. Sections 628 and 629 of the revenue act of 1918 are amended to read as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY (reading):

On page 176, in line 2, strike out the words "soft drinks" and insert in place thereof the word "beverages."

On page 176, after line 25, insert the following:

"SEC. 600. That there shall be levied upon intoxicating malt liquors containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, manufactured as provided by the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act, brewed or manufactured, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, a tax of 60 cents per wine gallon.

"SEC. 601. That upon all vinous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act, which are hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, when sold or removed for consumption, a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon.

"SEC. 602. That upon all spirituous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act, and other intoxicating liquors that are hereafter withdrawn from bond for sale or consumption, there shall be levied a tax of $6.40 per proof gallon."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the situation. The amendment of the Senator from New York is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. STERLING. With reference to the first section of this amendment, Mr. President, section 600, while I do not at all like the amendment, yet I shall not be disposed to object to it or to move to strike it out.

The amendment, section 600, provides as follows:

SEC. 600. That there shall be levied upon intoxicating malt liquors containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume, manufactured as provided by the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act, brewed or manufactured, and hereafter sold or removed for consumption or sale within the United States, a tax of 60 cents per wine gallon.

I do not object to a tax per se on beer, but this is a bill for the raising of revenue, and I do not think anything is to be accomplished by this provision in regard to the taxation of beer.

The two Houses of Congress, both the House and the Senate, by decisive and, I might say, overwhelming majorities, have declared against the manufacture and sale of beer for medicinal purposes. The conference report on the bill has been considered at great length, and I think I am warranted in saying the adoption of that conference report is imminent, and hence I see no necessity for this amendment, section 600.

However, as I said, I shall not object to it, thinking that it will be a subject of conference between the two Houses, and that by the time it is reached in conference, it may have been decided by the adoption of the conference report on H. R. 7294 that there is no necessity for providing for a tax on beer.

With reference to other provisions of the amendment of the Senator from New York I wish to offer amendments. I think the Senator from New York has practically agreed to those amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York, in section 601, as printed in that amendment, after the word "vinous," on line 11 of the amendment, strike out the words "alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes" and insert the words "liquors or preparations containing such vinous liquors."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, section 601, to which this amendment applies, reads as follows:

SEC. 601. That upon all vinous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department pursuant to the national prohibition act which are hereafter produced in or imported into the United States there shall be levied, collected, and paid, when sold or removed for consumption, a tax of $1.20 per wine gallon.

The contention is that that provision in the form in which it is proposed actually contravenes section 4 of the national prohibition act. Subdivision (b) of that section reads as follows:

Medicinal preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia, National Formulary, or the American Institute of Homeopathy that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

Subdivision (c) reads:

Patented, patent, and proprietary medicines that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

So that no medicinal preparation can be made from alcohol or vinous or distilled liquors or spirits unless it is unfit for beverage use, and the amendment I propose is for the purpose of covering that point.

I ask for a vote on this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota and the Senate to the fact that the expression "alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes" is the expression, word for word, used by the Secretary of the Treasury in setting out the regulations governing this very thing, and I assume the regulations gotten out by the Secretary of the Treasury were gotten up really by the prohibition enforcement bureau, and they contain that exact phrase.

The meaning, to my mind, is no different whatever, and I am willing to accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota what difference there is between the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York and the language he has proposed in its place? If I caught the wording as the Senator gave it, I can not see any difference.

Mr. STERLING. There is all the difference in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. There may be.

Mr. STERLING. This is the difference, the language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York is as follows:

That upon all vinous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes.

There are no alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes possible under the national prohibition act. If the Senator will turn to section 4 he will so find. They must be unfit for use for beverage purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be the provision in the prohibition act to which the Senator refers, but it is not so in actual practice.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know as to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nor according to the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. STERLING. It is prohibited in the national prohibition act. It is unfortunate, I think, that regulations of the kind described by the Senator from New York have been made in the face of the prohibition contained in section 4 of the national prohibition act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My only observation, in addition, is that the Senator from South Dakota and others who think the amendment which he proposes is necessary would better hasten to see the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau and have them change their regulations.

Mr. STERLING. Do not blame it on the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They drew the regulations.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know that they did.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the amendment is adopted the following words will have to be changed:

By the regulations of the Treasury Department, pursuant to the national prohibition act.

Otherwise there will be a conflict between the bill containing the words suggested by the Senator from South Dakota and the regulations of the department.

Mr. STERLING. Let there be a conflict if there is to be one, and let the regulations then conform to the law as the law now is. That is all we are asking.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I wish to correct an evident misapprehension in the mind of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] when he states that the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau ought to be seen and ought to change its regulations and that the regulations were prepared by that bureau. I will say to him that they were not prepared by that bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state by whom they were prepared?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not know, but they were not prepared by that bureau.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from New York why he wishes to reduce the tax on champagne 72 cents a gallon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a pointed question.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what happens.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is now $1.92 and under the Senator's amendment it would be $1.20.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question of the Senator from North Dakota does not comprehend the entire subject. All I am seeking is to put it on an equal percentage with still wine, which I do by my amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that the charge has been made that we are increasing the tax on the poor man's drink and decreasing it on champagne, and so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not particularly interested in the rate imposed in the amendment, so long as it is not so high as to make it inoperative as a revenue producer. At the time I drafted it, after consulting several of my colleagues, it was deemed wiser to have a flat rate on all wine.

The old law imposing taxes on wines prior to the advent of the eighteenth amendment taxed wines in varying degree. Still wines were taxed in accordance with their alcoholic content, varying, as I recollect it, from 16 cents a gallon to $1 a gallon. Sparkling wines, amongst which champagne is the most conspicuous, was taxed $1.92 per gallon. I thought $1.20 was about a mean between the two extremes and I think that is about the fact. That was my idea in offering that figure. If the Senator from North Dakota desires to restore that distinction between still wines and champagne, as a matter of principle I have no objection whatsoever. If he does that I think probably we ought to have the still wines at about 75 cents and champagne at about the old rate, but I thought it would be simpler as a matter of administration to have the flat rate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York that there has always been a difference in all the acts since I have been here; and there has been an average of about 72 cents a gallon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is, when wines were used for other than medicinal purposes?

Mr. SMOOT. Whether for medicinal purposes or for banquet purposes, it was always the same.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Hale	McLean	Stanfield.
Broussard	Harreld	McNary	Sterling
Bursum	Harris	New	Sutherland
Calder	Harrison	Newberry	Townsend
Capper	Heflin	Norbeck	Trammell
Curtis	Keyes	Oddie	Wadsworth
Dial	La Follette	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Dillingham	Lenroot	Pomerene	Warren
du Pont	Lodge	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Edge	McCormick	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.
France	McCumber	Shortridge	Willis
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Simmons
Gooding	McKinley	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether the principal amendment now pending is the one offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. REED. May we have the amendment to that amendment reported?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 11 of the amendment of the Senator from New York as printed, strike out the words "alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes," and insert in lieu "liquors or preparations containing such vinous liquors," so that it will read:

SEC. 601. That upon all vinous liquors or preparations containing such vinous liquors authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. I would like to inquire what change this makes in the import of the bill? I would like to ask the Senator who offered the amendment to the amendment what change it makes?

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator had been here when the amendment was offered he would have seen its purpose.

Mr. REED. Unfortunately I was not here.

Mr. STERLING. The amendment is really for the purpose of making the entire amendment; that is, section 601, conform to the law as it now is, and conform to section 4 and the subdivisions of section 4 relative to medicinal preparations. As the Senator from Missouri will note, the language of the amendment, section 601, is:

That upon all vinous alcoholic medicinal preparations fit for use for beverage purposes authorized to be manufactured—

And so forth.

"Fit for use as beverage purposes." Under the law the contention is that no medicinal preparations can be made that are fit for use as beverage purposes.

Medicinal preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia, National Formulary, or the American Institute of Homeopathy that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

So reads subdivision (b) of section 4 of the national prohibition act. Section (c) reads:

Patented, patent, and proprietary medicines that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

The object of the amendment to the amendment is to strike out the words "unfit for use for beverage purposes" and substitute the language of the law.

Mr. REED. Is it proposed to frame the bill so that a tax can not be levied upon such intoxicating liquors as are used for medicinal purposes?

Mr. STERLING. Oh, no; that is not the intent at all.

Mr. REED. I see no objection to this particular amendment, and I see no reason for it, but I am entirely willing that we should have a vote. On the amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and will vote. I vote "yea."

So Mr. STERLING's amendment to Mr. WADSWORTH's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I submit an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], to be designated as subdivision (k).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from New York will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York the following:

(k) There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all intoxicating liquors diverted to an unlawful purpose under the provisions of the internal revenue laws or the national prohibition act an additional tax equal in amount to that which is provided herein, such tax to be paid by the person responsible for such diversion to such unlawful purpose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from South Dakota whether he proposes to suggest any rule by which it is to be determined who is responsible?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not propose to do so.

Mr. REED. In all seriousness, I call the Senator's attention to the peculiar language of the amendment to the amendment—"person responsible."

Mr. STERLING. I understand the Senator from Missouri, but I shall leave to the prohibition enforcement officials to lay down the rule—to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. REED. That is, the Senator wants the prohibition enforcement officer to pass a law or to make a rule binding upon the American people instead of doing it by statute? I have not the slightest objection to the Senator's amendment, provided he will frame it in such a way that we shall know who the responsible party is—the person vending the liquor or importing the liquor contrary to law. There is no objection to that.

As I have said repeatedly, I am perfectly willing to aid in the enactment of reasonable legislation to carry out the eighteenth amendment, but I am not willing, and I hardly think my good friend from South Dakota will be willing, when he reflects upon the matter, to fix a penalty and leave the question as to the application of the penalty to some prohibition officer. That is not sound doctrine, and I have asked the question to elicit the Senator's view.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think we could hardly undertake to frame a rule for a case of this kind that for the unlawful diversion or use of any intoxicating liquor the person responsible shall be held for the double taxes. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I will say that this amendment follows closely, in meaning, at any rate, section 35 of the national prohibition act and imposes the same double liability for taxes. Calling attention to the language of section 35 of that act, it reads:

No liquor, revenue stamp, or tax receipts for any illegal manufacture or sale shall be issued in advance, but upon evidence of such illegal manufacture or sale a tax shall be assessed against and collected from—the person responsible for such illegal manufacture or sale in double the amount now provided by law, with an additional penalty of $500 on retail dealers and $1,000 on manufacturers.

So the national prohibition act from which I have quoted uses identically the same language in regard to responsibility and who shall be liable—"the person responsible"—that to be determined, of course, by those who have in charge the enforcement of the law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is not the language employed by the Senator in his amendment, as I heard the amendment read. I have not had the benefit of seeing the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator directed to me the question who is to determine who is responsible; and I am citing the section of the national prohibition act, which is clothed in the same language in regard to responsibility.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; it is a very different question. Of course, the citation of the national prohibition act as a precedent proves nothing, because there never was a law conceived that contained so many——

Mr. STERLING. Good things.

Mr. REED. That contained so many willful attempts to override the fundamental principles of the law as the particular statute to which the Senator from South Dakota now calls attention. I speak in all seriousness of it. I am not here to antagonize that particular law now, but the fact that certain phraseology is employed in that extremely drastic statute does not at all warrant its repetition. However, the language employed by the Senator from South Dakota in his amendment, in my judgment, is much more objectionable. The language of the national prohibition act is:

This act shall not relieve anyone from paying any taxes or other charges imposed upon the manufacture or traffic in such liquor.

Of course, that phraseology or similar phraseology has been repeatedly construed, and it covers the person engaged in the manufacture or traffic. The succeeding sentence to which the Senator particularly refers reads:

No liquor revenue stamps or tax receipts for any illegal manufacture or sale shall be issued in advance, but upon evidence of such illegal manufacture or sale a tax shall be assessed against, and collected from, the person responsible for such illegal manufacture or sale.

Applying that language to the context and to the well-known construction of the law, it would apply only to the person who manufactured or sold the liquor. I have no objection to an amendment to the proposed amendment couched in that kind of language; but the language is:

There shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all intoxicating liquors diverted to an unlawful purpose under the provisions of the internal revenue laws or the national prohibition act an additional tax equal in amount to that which is provided herein, such tax to be paid by the person responsible for such diversion to such unlawful purpose.

Any man with the slightest knowledge of the law knows that it would be contended under that language as now proposed that the person who purchased the liquor was responsible for the diversion as well as the person who sold the liquor. That never has been true under any law relating to the prohibition question. It is not true, as far as I know, in any State, although I may be in error about that; for when I find States actually proposing to abolish trial by jury, I am prepared to expect anything.

If the Senator will couch his amendment in language similar to that of the act, so that it is clear, as it is in the act, that its penalties are visited upon the vendor of the article or the manufacturer of the article who fails to pay a tax, I shall make no objection to it, because this is a revenue proposition, and I am in favor of getting all the revenue we possibly can.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Presient, I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if it would meet his objection if the last sentence of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota were stricken out? I understand that to be the language to which he objects:

Such tax to be paid by the person responsible for such diversion to such unlawful purpose.

Would that meet the Senator's objection?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIS. Will not the Senator from South Dakota consent to the striking out of that language?

Mr. STERLING. I hardly think so, Mr. President. In that respect the language follows almost verbatim the language of the national prohibition act as it is in regard to the illegal manufacture and sale. It provides that the tax—shall be assessed against, and collected from, the person responsible for such illegal manufacture or sale in double the amount now provided by law.

My proposed amendment is:

Such tax to be paid by the person responsible for such diversion to such unlawful purpose.

There is no material difference between the two.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, the provision of the amendment providing for the levying, collecting, and assessment of the tax is contained in the first part of the amendment. That is all perfectly clear, and every legal right that the Government has is covered in that portion of the amendment. The part to which the Senator from Missouri is objecting is the last sentence in the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I really think that if the Senator from Missouri considered the effect of striking out those words he would not want them stricken out. Who else should pay the double tax than the person responsible for the unlawful diversion—anybody that might be chosen?

Mr. REED. Who does the Senator say is responsible? I am going to assume in the illustration, without offense, that the Senator is a manufacturer of liquor, and that he sells it to me. Who is responsible in that case? Who will the Senator contend is responsible? Who does he think the court would say is responsible—he or myself, or both of us?

Mr. STERLING. If I unlawfully manufacture and sell to the Senator I am responsible. I am personally responsible for the illegal sale as well as for the illegal manufacture.

Mr. REED. What about the buyer, the purchaser? Is it not the Senator's purpose here to reach the purchaser?

Mr. STERLING. No.

Mr. REED. Then will the Senator accept an amendment of this kind?—

Such tax to be paid by the vendor or manufacturer.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, this does not apply necessarily to a sale or to the manufacture. The diversion to an unlawful purpose may be in some other manner than by manufacture or by sale, and that is the reason why the broad language is used, the unlawful diversion of it. The language of the national prohibition act, I think, refers again and again to the unlawful diversion of alcohol or of intoxicating liquors generally; and that unlawful diversion from the purpose for which manufactured or sold under the national prohibition act is unlawful under the terms of the national prohibition act. We provide here, just as in section 35, a double tax for an illegal sale or manufacture.

Mr. REED. Let me put it this way: A man gets a doctor's prescription for a pint of whisky for medicine, and he finally concludes that he wants to drink it regardless of the condition of his health. He has diverted it from the original purpose. Is the Senator going to have a lawsuit filed against him to collect the tax on that pint of whisky? That is just exactly what can be done under the language of this amendment. The person who diverted it is the man who got it on a prescription and finally concluded that he would drink it as a matter of amusement; and, as has been suggested by a learned Senator whose name I shall not mention, there are a great many people who would be willing to stand a lawsuit in order to secure a pint. [Laughter.] I am not going to expose this Senator if he does not do it himself.

In all seriousness, I ask the Senator if he would accept an amendment so that the last two lines of his amendment would read as follows:

Such tax to be paid by the manufacturer or vendor of said liquor.

Will the Senator accept that sort of an amendment to his amendment?

Mr. STERLING. Is that all of the Senator's proposed amendment?

Mr. REED. That is all.

Mr. STERLING. No, Mr. President; I do not feel justified in accepting that amendment, because there may be an unlawful diversion in other ways than by manufacture or sale.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two lines and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Such tax to be paid by the vendor of such intoxicating liquors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

So Mr. REED's amendment to Mr. STERLING's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry in regard to the amendment adopted just previous to the vote taken upon this last amendment. I am among those who supported it; in fact, the vote in favor of the amendment was unanimous. I have since read the amendment, and I gather the impression that the language inserted in place of the language stricken out is such that it will be construed as imposing this tax upon the preparations in which vinous liquors may be used, just the same as on the vinous liquor itself. I have no desire whatever to tax the preparation; I do not believe a big majority of the Senators have such a desire. But here is the way the section reads as amended:

That upon all vinous liquors or preparations containing such vinous liquors authorized to be manufactured by the regulations of the Treasury Department pursuant to the national prohibition act which are hereafter produced in or imported into the United States, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, when sold or removed for consumption, a tax of $1.20 per gallon.

I call special attention to the language in the first sentence:

That upon all vinous liquors or preparations containing such vinous liquors.

I am unable to see how one can construe that otherwise than as imposing a tax upon the liquors and upon the preparations in which they may be used, the rate being fixed at $1.20 per gallon. I think the tax ought to be imposed upon liquor, but I do not think the tax ought to be imposed upon preparations which might have the liquor used in the preparation.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator's construction is correct, and I rather think it is, it would not only be $1.20 upon the vinous liquor in the preparation, but that would be the tax upon the whole preparation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the point I am attempting to bring to the notice of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator's construction is absolutely correct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not see how one can construe it otherwise. It says "all preparations in which vinous liquors are used." What does it mean if it does not mean that?

Mr. President, I very much object to the amendment in that form. Although I wish to tax the liquor, I do not desire to tax medical preparations because they have in them a certain quantity of vinous liquor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I, like the Senator from Florida, voted for this amendment under a misapprehension as to exactly what it contained. I agree with his construction of it, and I do not propose to be recorded as voting to tax medicine. I am opposed to taxing medicine. I think the tax bill we have here taxes nearly everything from the cradle to the grave and makes it almost impossible for anybody to get the necessities of life, and when those are withdrawn and a fellow falls sick for want of proper nourishment we should not tax the medicine he has to take in order to get him up on his feet again.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Did not the Senator vote for the Willis-Campbell bill, which prohibited the prescribing of a glass of beer for medicinal purposes? Is it better to tax it than to prohibit it?

Mr. HEFLIN. That bill is in conference now, Mr. President.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I know that, but the Senate passed the House bill, and it is in conference on the Stanley amendment, and you say you would not tax it, but you will prohibit it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Oh, the Senator wants to get a glass of beer for his patient. I am talking about medicine that is kept on the shelves of the drug stores of the country and used every day all over the land. Beer is not permitted yet to be used as medicine.

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is permitted now, under the regulations issued last week.

Mr. HEFLIN. By the Treasury Department.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I mean Congress has not given its sanction yet.

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I interrupt the Senator again?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have noticed evidences of an agreement being reached here to-night between the Senators from Louisiana and Missouri and the Senators from South Dakota and Ohio, and I am getting a little scared. I do not understand the situation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. This was one of the very few provisions upon which I have not had a clear idea and have not voted, and I refrained from voting for the very reason that there is a puzzle about it somewhere.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to go upon record as distinctly opposed to taxing the medicine of the people of this country. I will not vote to tax medicine that has alcohol in it to preserve the medicine. If you take a spoonful of alcohol and five spoonfuls of wine and mix them up in medicine to give to the sick, I fear that it is covered under this amendment. I did not know that at the time I voted for it. I asked the Senator from South Dakota about it, and he thought it was all right.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, does the genial Senator from Alabama think that the concoction he has just described is a pretty good dose for a well man, or a sick man, either?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would not deny it to the sick man because some well man might stumble over it, or fall down on it, or with it.

Mr. President, having voted for the amendment, I desire to serve notice that I shall move to reconsider it to-morrow, because I do not want it to go out to the country that the Senate has gone on record as being unanimously in favor of taxing the medicine of the people. I do not think the amendment would have obtained 12 votes in this body if Senators had known exactly what they were voting on. I give notice now, Mr. President, as one who voted in the affirmative, that I will move on to-morrow to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to say, Mr. President, that the object was to tax the alcoholic content and not the medicinal preparations. If I thought the amendment could be given the construction put on it by the Senator, I myself would have asked a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to. The matter may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did I understand the Senator to say that he intended his amendment to cover the taxing of the alcoholic content?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, if the alcoholic content was one-half of 1 per cent in a wine gallon, what would we get in the matter of revenue under the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there would be much.

Mr. McCUMBER. We would not get enough out of it to pay for the printing of the paper.

Mr. SMOOT. Under most of the former tax measures, where liquors have been used in preparations, the tax has only been imposed upon the quantity of the liquor contained in the preparation, and I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that in all extracts of every name or nature, and all drugs that may be made in the drug store, they run all the way from 10 per cent up to 60 per cent and sometimes 70 per cent of the alcohol in those preparations, and necessarily so, but the tax only applies upon the wine gallon if it is vinous liquors, or upon the proof gallon if it is alcohol, on the amount that is contained in the preparation. That is very easily figured, whether it is an 8-ounce bottle or whether it is a pint bottle or whether it is a quart or gallon. As it is put up it takes so many of them to make a proof gallon of alcohol or a wine gallon in case it is vinous liquor, and the tax is assessed to the manufacturer and paid upon the amount of those liquors in the preparation. That is the way it ought to be.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator from South Dakota want the amendment to go over?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not want it to go over. I shall object to its going over.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota accept this amendment, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to see if it will not meet his objections. Change the amendment so as to read:

Liquors or such liquors contained in medicinal preparations not fit for beverage purposes.

Does that meet the objection of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Ohio if his purpose is to tax liquor intended for medicinal purposes—I mean alcohol contained in medicine?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly; that is in the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. WILLIS. The amendment provides, for example, for a tax of $6.40 a gallon on whisky, whether used for medicinal purposes or otherwise. That is the whole purpose of the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think the Senator from Ohio has gone clear outside of the intention of the amendment of the Senator from New York. As I understood that amendment it was not intended to tax any alcohol contained in any medicine that is permitted to be prescribed, whereas the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would tax any legitimate medicine which a physician might prescribe and which contained alcohol.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the proposed legislation appeals to me as rather an indirect way to tax liquor that is supposed to be used for beverage purposes, but secured through prescriptions or medicinal distribution. I do not think that it is defensible to levy a tax supposedly on medicine, because we all know that the only way liquor can be dispensed to-day legally is as medicine through prescriptions. It is indefensible to levy a tax of that character on medicine, suddenly tripling the amount of the tax, not admitting that the thought or purpose is to tax that which is used for beverage purposes, because, of course, we could not legislate for something that we know is illegal. Indirectly, it seems to me, that must be the thought, that we are tripling the amount of the tax because we assume that a large proportion of the liquor taken out under medicinal prescription is used for other purposes.

Personally, I think that as far as we can go is to consider the legal purpose, which is medicine, and when we impose or levy a tax as high as that suggested in the proposed amendment for medicine it is not a correct theory. If we are going to attempt in this indirect way to reach a situation that perhaps does exist, I think we are simply in a way granting a premium on an evasion of the law. So far as I am concerned, I think the tax should be for medicine such as we would, in our judgment, believe that medicine should pay, if we believe it should pay at all; but not this sudden increase to three or four times the ordinary amount that would be taxed, and has been taxed, on alcohol used in medicine. Personally, I think it is very unwise legislation.

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York pardon a brief interruption?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. A moment ago the genial Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] said it created a suspicion in his mind when he saw me in conference with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. I have just detected the Senator from Alabama with his nose about two and one-half inches from that of the Senator from Ohio, and my suspicions are in turn aroused. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I wish to reply to what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has said. Section 602 of the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] is in exact form with an amendment proposed by me. This section is for the purpose of obtaining additional revenue for the United States Government. Under the present law alcohol is taxed at the rate of $2.20 a gallon, whether used in pharmaceutical preparations or withdrawn in the form of whisky.

In the calendar year 1919, that being the first year of prohibition, there were withdrawn from the distilleries in this country 5,200,000 gallons of whisky, upon which a tax of $2.20 a gallon was paid. In the calendar year 1920 there were 8,700,000 gallons of whisky withdrawn from the distilleries, on which the same tax was paid. Three million five hundred thousand gallons more were withdrawn in 1920 than in 1919. While this was ostensibly withdrawn for medicinal purposes, I venture to say that 90 per cent of it was used for beverage purposes.

We can make all the laws we like, but we can not prevent this being done until the whisky now in the distilleries is used up or its manufacture and sale is forbidden for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. EDGE. What is the increase—from $2.20 to $6.40 a gallon?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; from $2.20 to $6.40 a gallon. Six dollars and forty cents per gallon was the amount of the tax levied on whisky before the national prohibition law went into effect. We simply place the tax upon it now exactly as it was before prohibition. If we had charged $6.40 a gallon upon the 5,200,000 gallons withdrawn in 1919, we would have had an additional tax paid into the Federal Treasury in that year of $21,840,000. If we had had the additional tax of $4.20 on the 8,700,000 gallons withdrawn last year, the greater portion of which of course was withdrawn for beverage purposes, although taken out for medicinal purposes, we would have had an additional amount of tax paid into the Treasury of $36,540,000.

The tax proposed in this amendment is exactly that which was charged the year before the national prohibition law went into effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from New York what assurance there is that demands during the coming year will be as great as they were during the past year? That is one question. Secondly, may I inquire of the Senator what effect his amendment would have upon the patent medicines for which there seems to be so much solicitude? Will not any of these liquors so withdrawn be used in the manufacture of medicine?

Mr. CALDER. The Senator undoubtedly refers to alcohol withdrawn from distilleries, much of which is used in the manufacture of medicines. In the year 1919 about 15,000,000 gallons of alcohol, not including whiskey, was withdrawn from the distilleries, and that paid a tax of $2.20 a gallon. In the year 1920 there were 27,000,000 gallons of alcohol, exclusive of whisky, withdrawn, an increase in the one year of 12,000,000 gallons. Of course, we assume that this was withdrawn for the industries and for manufacturing medicines. A great deal of it, however, went into the manufacture of the so-called bootleg whisky.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. If I have correctly interpreted the remarks and the meaning of the Senator from New York, he views the very large withdrawal of whisky as for purposes other than those permitted under the law; and recognizing and realizing and practically frankly stating that, he proposes now to go back to the old tax of $6.40, or whatever it was, when liquor was permitted to be dispensed for beverage purposes; in other words, he recognizes and realizes the absolute futility of attempting to enforce the present prohibition law.

Mr. CALDER. I know that the prohibition law can be enforced better than it has been in the past. I do not, however, believe that it is possible to completely enforce it, but I agree with what the Senator says, that most of the whisky manufactured and sold is going to be used as a beverage, although withdrawn for medicinal purposes.

I took occasion the other day to inquire from a physician just how whisky was obtained from a druggist. I got a prescription for a pint of whisky, and obtained the whisky in a drug store here in the District of Columbia. I paid $3.60 for it. This price was paid with a tax of $2.20 a gallon, or something like 27 cents a pint. Before prohibition, we could have purchased this same whisky for $1.40 a pint, and upon that the tax was paid at the rate of $6.40 a gallon. With the tax now proposed we can bring into the Federal Treasury $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 more this year than last out of whisky alone, and will at the same time do nothing to affect the tax of alcohol used in the manufacture of pharmaceutical products or for the industries. We can get that additional amount of money and in a measure discourage the sale of liquor for beverage purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as some of the smaller taxes and whether we will retain them depend on whether we shall adopt a general provision for the taxing of capital stock, I ask permission to consider at this time Title X, or the tax on capital stock under Title X, amendment No. 60, on page 212 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that that section has been agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is an amendment to be offered to that, on page 212, after line 12, as proposed by the majority of the committee. It has reference to the special excise tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has an amendment which he desires to offer to that. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the amendment reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 212, after line 12, insert the following:

Section 1000——

Mr. REED. What is the number of this amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether there was an agreement as to the section?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section has been agreed to.

Mr. KING. I think the chairman of the committee, then, should move to reconsider.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was not present when this section was agreed to, and I did not understand that the title had been agreed to without the amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. LODGE. Neither did I, for I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I, therefore, ask that the vote by which Title X was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 212, after line 12, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 1000. (a) That on and after July 1, 1922, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 1000 of the revenue act of 1918—

"(1) Every domestic corporation shall pay annually a special excise tax with respect to carrying on or doing business, equivalent to $1 for each $1,000 of so much of the fair average value of its capital stock for the preceding year ending June 30 as is in excess of $5,000. In estimating the value of capital stock the surplus and undivided profits shall be included."

Mr. LODGE. At that point I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. The capital-stock tax provided for in section 1000 of the revenue law is based on the fair average value of the stock of the corporation. That value may be based largely upon the stock of other corporations, which other corporations are also subject to a capital-stock tax. That results in double or multiple taxation. For the purpose of curing that defect or evil, as it seems to me, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment which I offer, I understand, has been considered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. REED. Just one moment. Is the amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to the text of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is proposed to the printed amendment No. 60, which is found on page 13 of the pamphlet copy of committee amendments.

Mr. LODGE. It is found on page 13 of the printed amendments, under amendment No. 60, at the end of paragraph, the concluding sentence of which reads:

In estimating the value of capital stock the surplus and undivided profits shall be included.

Then I offer my amendment which, I repeat, has been considered by a majority of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the last line of paragraph 1 of subdivision (a) of the proposed section 1000, after the word "include," and before the semicolon, it is proposed to insert a comma and the following words:

but if the taxpayer owns at least a majority of the voting stock, and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of any other domestic corporation liable to the tax imposed by this section, the fair average value for the preceding year ending June 30 of the stock so owned by the taxpayer shall be deducted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. How much revenue would we lose by that amendment? In other words, how much would it reduce the tax that we would realize from the capital stock tax against corporations?

Mr. LODGE. I understand from the estimates which have been made that the amendment would reduce the returns $20,000,000, but I have always thought that double and multiple taxation ought to be cured. This seems to me to be only fair. The present law has the effect of taxing twice and sometimes more than twice the stock which is held in subsidiary corporations which is already taxed and which is again taxed in the holding company.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts it is this: If there are a holding company and a good many subsidiaries no tax shall be imposed except upon the holding company?

Mr. LODGE. Not if the subsidiary is taxed as well as the holding company.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In that case which is exempted?

Mr. SIMMONS. Would all of the capital stock of all of the subsidiary companies exactly equal the stock held by the holding company?

Mr. LODGE. Not necessarily.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, the holding company might have very much less stock than the aggregate stock of the subsidiaries?

Mr. LODGE. The amendment, as I understood it read, requires a majority of the stock, does it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. The subsidiary corporation will pay upon its entire stock; then the holding corporation would pay upon its entire stock and have deducted therefrom the value of its stock in the subsidiary corporation.

Mr. LODGE. Which has already once been taxed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Which has already been taxed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator have in mind a case where the holding company would have no assets that were represented by stock except such as were represented in the subsidiary company?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not see any difference whatever, inasmuch as the subsidiary corporation pays the full tax upon all of its stock, even though the stock be held by the principal corporation. Whatever the value of the stock held by the principal corporation may be will be deducted when the principal or holding company pays its stock tax, because that stock in the subsidiary corporation has already paid its tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, perhaps I can state a case and in stating it show the Senator just what effect the amendment would have: A holding company, we will say, has $1,000,000 capital, and there are two subsidiary companies, one with $250,000 capital and another with $500,000 capital, which would make a total holding of the two subsidiary companies of $750,000. The two subsidiary companies will pay on their capital stock whatever rate is provided for in the law.

Mr. SIMMONS. On their $750,000 of capital?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; on their $750,000. When the holding company makes its return, having $1,000,000 of capital stock, it will be allowed credit for $750,000, the tax on which has been paid by the two subsidiary companies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think we have reached an important question, and I wish to inquire how long we are going to be required to stay here in this very depressing atmosphere?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We thought, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, that we would remain here until we disposed of this proposition, and then go home.

Mr. LODGE. Until the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. REED. I have an amendment to this section which I propose to offer as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of, and I imagine that my amendment is going to provoke a considerable amount of discussion. So far as I am concerned, I am worn out with this day's work, and there is not any possibility of passing this bill this week.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There is not, if we do not go on with it; that is certain.

Mr. REED. I see no use in keeping Senators here to the point of punishment, when surely it ought to be conceded that Senators, while they have expressed their opinion fully about this bill, have not tried to delay it. We have adopted an amendment of very great importance with practically no discussion. I refer to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I cite that merely to show that there is no disposition here to consume time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There is no question about that.

Mr. REED. I do not want to present my amendment to-night with a meager attendance of the Senate. We have barely a quorum, if we have that. The matter which is now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts I think involves a very important question. I do not think it can be passed over lightly at all. It is a debatable question, and I suggest the propriety of adjourning or taking a recess. There is a limit to human endurance.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us dispose of the pending matter first.

Mr. REED. This matter is going to provoke some discussion.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is entirely legitimate, of course. This is a debatable question, and it ought to be debated, but it is not a new question. The capital-stock tax has been before us from the very beginning, and those of us who will ever become familiar with it are more or less familiar with the subject now. I suggest that we go on and at least determine the question which has been presented by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and then, if the Senator from Missouri does not desire to proceed with his amendment, we can wait until to-morrow for that. There is no disposition to crowd the Senator, but, after all, there is no reason why we should not go on with the pending amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think—and I say it in all good nature to the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Massachusetts, both of whom fully know how highly I esteem them—that the attempt to hold the Senate here during these long hours day after day would be entirely justifiable if there were a great emergency confronting us; it might be justifiable if there were a filibuster going on; but nothing of that kind is before us. We ought to observe reasonable hours, hours that will permit a man to live a little beyond the present session of Congress if he has an ordinary degree of vitality. Of course, if Senators say they are going on, they have control of the situation; but I think we ought to adjourn.

Mr. LODGE. I think we might finish the pending amendment at least. We made an agreement last night and expected to get through speedily with the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. WALSH], but the whole day was spent on that question.

Mr. REED. That is true; the whole day has been spent on it, but it was a day well spent. We came within one vote of adding an important amendment. So one by one the roses fall and one by one the converts are coming up to the mourners' bench.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If that be true, the Senator ought to be willing to go on to-night, because the longer we go the better it gets from his standpoint.

Mr. REED. No; I think even to be a good Christian one ought to have a little sleep occasionally.

Mr. LODGE. I think we might finish the pending amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there are some Senators who are absent to-night who, I know, will be interested in this amendment. If it is insisted that we shall go on, I can talk on it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if we are to be held here to suit the convenience of other Senators who can be here and choose to go away, of course we will never get anywhere.

Mr. REED. No; but to stay here from 11 o'clock in the morning to half past 9 at night is a violation of the union rules, and it is a violation of good-health rules.

Mr. LODGE. It is a long day, I admit; but Senators on the other side have left us no choice but long days. We shall have to stay in session long days if we are going to get the bill through.

Mr. REED. Of course, somebody had to explain this bill, and the proponents of it have absolutely refused to do so, throwing the whole burden upon this side; but I do not say this jestingly. Of course, if the Senator insists on going on, I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum in that event, and if we have to go on we will go on.

Mr. LODGE. We can supply a quorum.

Mr. REED. Very well. I suggest the absence of one.

I ask that the petition may be inserted in the RECORD, together with the names which are signed to it, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

PETITION TO CONGRESS.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

RECESS.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I now renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 9 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, October 29, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, October 28, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WALSH.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed heavenly Father, we lift heart and voice unto Thee, for we have no other refuge. May they chant a thankful and silent refrain in grateful memory of Thy love, so amazing, so divine. Frail and feeble are we, yet in Thee do we put our trust and Thou wilt never fail us. Bestow blessings of loving care upon all our homes and may our children always love to claim us as their own. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a question of procedure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes on a question of procedure. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, Monday next is a maverick. There are on the Unanimous Consent Calendar a number of bridge bills and some others of more or less local character, which I think the House could readily dispose of and which it would be well to have disposed of promptly, or considered, at least. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and suspensions may be in order on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and suspensions may be in order on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. PARRISH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, although I will not object, I would like to know if the gentleman from Wyoming will give us any assurance as to when the road bill will be considered?

Mr. MONDELL. I hope on Monday afternoon; if not, on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The order to-day is business on the Private Calendar.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that private pension bills in order to-day may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that private pension bills in order to-day may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I suppose that is to apply to bills both from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions. Is that the understanding?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Private pension bills. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the formal committee amendments to each bill may be offered after the reading of the bill has been completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman ask unanimous consent that the formal committee amendments may be offered to each bill upon the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

During the reading of the foregoing bill the following occurred:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming for a moment for the benefit of some of the Members. Is it the purpose to adjourn over to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad the gentleman has asked me that question, as I had intended to say that unless there is a very considerable insistence on the part of the membership of the House to the contrary I shall ask that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet on Monday. Not hearing any insistence for a meeting on Saturday, and realizing that Members have been working very diligently, and that they really need a day to attend to departmental work and to catch up with their correspondence, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendments to the bill H. R. 7340.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER].

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT PLAINFIELD, N. J.

Mr. ACKERMAN rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Jersey rise?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 2425.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage Senate bill 2425. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2425) granting permission to the city of Plainfield, N. J., to widen Watchung Avenue in front of the Federal post-office building, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to convey by quitclaim deed to the city of Plainfield, N. J., for street purposes, and for no other purpose, all the right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all or any lesser part of a strip of land off the west side and along the Watchung Avenue frontage of the Federal building site in said city 10 feet in width, except opposite the entrance steps of the Federal building, where such strip shall be approximately 3 feet 9 inches in width; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to remodel, alter, and repair, and do such other work upon said Federal building, grounds, and approaches as may be necessary, in his opinion, for the accommodation and convenience of the business of the United States on account of the widening of said Watchung Avenue: Provided, however, That the said city of Plainfield, as a consideration for such conveyance, shall bear the costs of all of said work upon said Federal building, grounds, and approaches as ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury: And provided further, That the said city of Plainfield shall not have the right to sell or convey the said described premises, nor to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore provided; and in the event said premises shall not be used for street purposes only and cared for and maintained as are other public streets in said city the right, title, and interest hereby authorized to be conveyed shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from New Jersey whether this bill, or a similar House bill, has been favorably reported from the House committee?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that a similar bill, H. R. 8840, has been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the report, No. 443, is on file with the Clerk of the House at the present time. It is a favorable report.

Mr. STAFFORD. How recently was it reported?

Mr. ACKERMAN. It was reported on October 26.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire further whether the Treasury Department approves in toto of the provisions contained in the bill?

Mr. ACKERMAN. It does; and there is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury printed in full in the report. I will say to the gentleman that no expense to the United States is involved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry. There are various bills reported from the Pensions Committee, and I wish to know if this will interfere with the consideration of those bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that nobody from the Pensions Committee seemed to be seeking recognition of the Chair.

Mr. ROBSION. Will this displace those pension bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not at all. This is a request for unanimous consent. Is there objection?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBSION, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Pensions I call up H. R. 5597.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up from the Committee on Pensions a bill which the Clerk will report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry—a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether the unanimous consent requested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] is limited only to the general pension bills reported by the Committee on Pensions and Invalid Pensions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the request of the gentleman from Illinois was that private pension bills on the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, which would include omnibus bills and private pension bills as well.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if this bill is to be called up, I think we ought to have a quorum present. I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that no quorum is present. It is clear that no quorum is present.

N. MAY JERNEGAN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 5597) granting a pension to Nettie May Jernegan, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nettie May Jernegan, widow of Warren G. Jernegan, in special recognition of the services rendered by the said Warren G. Jernegan in assisting in the discovery and the means of preventing, as well as the cause and method of propagation of, yellow fever, and pay her a pension at the rate of $125 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

With the following committee amendments: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "Nettie" and insert the letter "N."

In lines 7, 8, 9, and 10 strike out the words "in special recognition of the services rendered by the said Warren G. Jernegan in assisting in the discovery and the means of preventing, as well as the cause and method of propagation of, yellow fever," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "late of the Hospital Corps, United States Army, War with Spain."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I feel that a few words of explanation would be entirely in order in connection with this bill. The question has been raised, Why was this pension not included in the omnibus bill from our committee? The reasons are, first, that the circumstances are peculiar, and in order to cover an explanation of the bill a report of several pages is necessary. In the second place, the amount asked for is larger than the amount carried in the ordinary omnibus bill.

The facts are: Warren G. Jernegan was a private in the Hospital Corps in the Spanish-American War; enlisted for a period of three years and served for a period of three years. After the actual fighting was over and Gen. Wood was made Governor General of Cuba, there was a commission appointed by the War Department to go to Cuba and study the cause of and the propagation of yellow fever. At that time yellow fever was sweeping down the American forces who were occupying the island.

Gen. Wood said that 30 per cent of his officers lost their lives through yellow fever. Cubans born and raised in Cuba are practically immune from yellow fever, but persons coming there from northern regions where they are not infested by the kind of mosquito which was discovered to be the cause of spreading yellow fever are not immune, and when they go into these regions are almost immediately and almost certainly afflicted by yellow fever. The commission was headed by Dr. Walter Reed, and he had associated with him Dr. Carroll and Dr. Lazear. They went to the island and appealed to Gen. Wood and asked him for volunteers from the military forces to undertake the necessary experiments.

This man Warren G. Jernegan was one of the men who stepped up and said that he was willing to risk his life in order to advance medical science, in order that the lives of other people might thereby be saved. He was placed in a room where yellow fever patients had died. He slept on the bed that the yellow fever patients had died upon, and in the clothing that yellow fever patients had worn. He did not take yellow fever. Then he was inoculated with the blood taken from the veins of patients suffering from yellow fever. From that he did contract the disease, but he did not die immediately, nor as a result of yellow fever. He married in June, 1901. His enlistment expired in November, 1901. In 1905 there was born a child, and the evidence before the committee shows that that child has never been strong. The child is now 16 years old and lives with its mother, the father having died from influenza and pneumonia in 1919. This child is so weak, so infirm, that it is believed its condition is a result of the weakened constitution of the father and the result of the experiments to which he subjected himself. The child is asthmatic, is nervous, and has never been able to attend a public school. The mother is compelled to send the child to a private school, where it receives particular attention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has stated that the frail condition of the child was occasioned by the weakened condition of the father, which he ascribes to the result of the inoculation of yellow-fever germs, or the transmission of blood from a yellow-fever patient to himself. Is there anything in the record—there is nothing in the report which I have read—any testimony before the committee to show that the father during his service on the Isthmus 10 years afterwards, or at any time thereafter, was in a weakened physical condition?

Mr. McSWAIN. There was nothing in the records to show that the father himself did not have sufficient strength to do the ordinary work of a man.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman made the statement that the frail condition of the child was due to the weakened condition of the father, and I am merely asking to ascertain the facts.

Mr. McSWAIN. Exactly; but it is the belief of the people who knew, and it is common sense, I should think, to conclude that if the father subjected himself to this treatment, and if he did, as a result of his bravery, receive an injection into his body of these disease germs, his constitution would be weakened; and even though he did drag along, even though he was able to work in the Panama Canal Zone later, yet I believe that the condition of the child, which is an only child of a wedlock of 18 years, must be the result of the weakened condition of the father. I have the affidavits here of people who now live in Arkansas, a Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Douglas, who testified that they were in Cuba at the time and knew the circumstances surrounding the treatment of this man, knew the married life of the husband and wife, and that the husband did suffer from the disease.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman says that this man after he was subjected to this experimentation recovered his health and lived for years.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; he lived about 18 years, I believe.

Mr. MILLER. And there were no ill effects during his lifetime from this thing?

Mr. McSWAIN. I never saw him myself.

Mr. MILLER. Is there anything in the record—in the testimony before the committee—to that effect?

Mr. McSWAIN. There is nothing before the committee to show that the man was not able to carry on the ordinary work of a man.

Mr. MILLER. Who is it that testified before the committee that the health of this child is the result of the experimentation upon the father?

Mr. McSWAIN. There was no testimony, no witnesses. We have the letters and affidavits of people. For instance, we had numerous letters from the mother.

Mr. MILLER. Why not pension the child? This is really a pension for the child.

Mr. McSWAIN. It is for the mother and the child, and I would gladly consent to an amendment that it shall include the child, because that is the purpose of it.

Mr. MILLER. What precedents has this Congress established about granting pensions under such circumstances?

Mr. McSWAIN. There are three precedents. There is the widow of Dr. Walter Reed, who died in the city of Washington, not from yellow fever, for he never had any disease germs put into his body, but who did die here in this city from acute appendicitis. His widow is on the pension roll at the rate of $125 a month. This poor private's widow is down in Spartanburg, working in a 5 and 10 cent store, making $10 or $12 a week, and has this poor invalid child on her hands. All her husband left her was $1,500 in a life insurance policy. Does the gentleman want the other precedents?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. They consist of the widow of Dr. James Carroll and of Dr. Jesse W. Lazear. Dr. Lazear did die in Cuba as a result of exposure he suffered while there. Dr. Carroll did not. When Dr. Carroll died he left a widow, as did Dr. Lazear. The question of pensioning them came before Congress in 1908, and on January 31, 1908, this message was sent to the committee having it in charge:

JANUARY 31, 1908.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS:

I call your particular attention to the accompanying memorandum from the Surgeon General of the Army in behalf of the widows and children of Dr. James Carroll and Dr. Jesse W. Lazear. I earnestly hope the pensions can be provided for in both cases.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Now, there are your precedents, the widow of Dr. Walter Reed, for whom the great hospital here is named, and the widow of Dr. Carroll, and the widow of Dr. Lazear. These three are now on the pension roll at the rate of $125 a month. Some one has said that this man was nothing but a private. Of course, in time of war it is necessary to have rank, it is necessary to have colonels and generals who get higher pay than does a private.

But when the uniform is doffed and all become citizens again, the only way to be fair is to pension the widow of the private just the same as to pension the widow of the officer.

Mr. MILLER. May I ask this question. Will this give a pension to the widow?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; to the widow and child.

Mr. MILLER. Is that case of Dr. Walter Reed the case of a widow and child?

Mr. McSWAIN. I am not sure about the case of Dr. Walter Reed; I want to say to my friend I am not sure, but I assume so.

Mr. MILLER. Is this the only case the committee has in view as to pensioning under these circumstances?

Mr. McSWAIN. It has only one that has come to the surface.

Mr. ROBSION. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I will.

Mr. ROBSION. As I understand it, which I know from the record, this man did undergo this experimentation—sleep in clothing that had been worn by a yellow fever patient.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBSION. Did either one of those three men whose widows are getting $125 each go through the same experimentation?

Mr. McSWAIN. Not one. Dr. Walter Reed took the commission down there and afterwards died in the city of Washington from an attack of acute appendicitis, and his widow and children—I say children—get $125 a month. Now, I am informed it is the same with Dr. Carroll. Dr. Lazear did die from yellow fever. I am not saying at all that Congress did anything wrong in 1908, because the Surgeon General of the United States Army, M. W. Ireland, says this in speaking of these same men on page 2 of the report:

I am sure that the history of preventive medicine does not contain other examples where the sacrifice of individuals has accomplished so much for humanity as did the volunteers in the yellow-fever experiments in Cuba.

The Surgeon General of the United States Army says that the history of medicine shows no parallel case, because yellow fever was sweeping people down in the southern and tropical regions, and since they have learned the cause they have had an opportunity to combat it.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I will.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman talks about being fair. Does not the gentleman know that a great many other privates went to Cuba at the same time that this man did?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. And they came back and only worked half time, and when they died their widows got $12 a month and $2 for each child. Does the gentleman think it is fair to give this woman ten times as much as these widows of other privates get?

Mr. McSWAIN. I will answer. The other men only subjected themselves to those hazards that military duty compels, but when Gen. Wood issued a bulletin saying in effect, "Who will volunteer to undergo the hazards of the invisible dangers of yellow fever; who will go and sleep in this room with windows and doors closed where men have stayed who had yellow fever"——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be continued for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be continued for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can we have some understanding as to time? There are some of us who are opposed to the bill. I am not desirous of opposing the granting of time to those who wish to speak in favor of the bill, but I think those in opposition should have an equal amount of time. I ask unanimous consent that there may be time in opposition to the same amount as to those in favor.

Mr. McSWAIN. We agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that gentlemen opposed to the bill may have the same amount of time as those who favor it. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me it would be proper for the gentleman to suggest some specific time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from South Carolina has had 15 minutes and has been granted another 5 minutes, which makes 20 minutes. Now, there are others who wish to speak. I do not wish to lengthen the debate——

Mr. BANKHEAD. My objection is rather to the indefiniteness of the request, as I think it ought to be specific.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the time may be——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama objects.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I reserved the right to object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I submit the further suggestion that the time be extended to those in favor 20 minutes. That would make the time 35 minutes for those in favor and half an hour to those in opposition.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is all right.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. That the time for debate be extended so that there will be 20 minutes more allowed those in favor and 30 minutes to those in opposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time be extended 20 minutes to those in favor of the bill and 30 minutes to those opposed. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have three minutes. I am in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, on page 2 of the bill it says:

Amend the title so as to read "A bill granting an increase of pension."

Can the gentleman state what kind of a pension is being received now?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; she is receiving a pension now from the Pension Bureau under the general law of $12 a month. She did receive for one year $2 additional for the child up to the age of 16. The child was 16 last spring; that has expired now.

Mr. HILL. At this time she is receiving only $12 a month?

Mr. McSWAIN. Only $12 a month, under the general law.

Mr. Speaker, I move to amend——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. McSWAIN. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the highest rate that the Committee on Pensions grants to widows who are suffering with bad cases of injury or who have children? What would be the largest amount that would be recommended by the Committee on Pensions if she was included under a general omnibus bill?

Mr. McSWAIN. I am not informed as to that. I would not undertake to say. But I say that this comes under a different class; that this widow ought not to be in the same class as the other widows.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask some member of the Committee on Pensions what is the highest rate paid to widows of Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. It is $12 ordinarily, and $25 if they can show the soldier died of disabilities incurred in the service.

Mr. LITTLE. That is not the maximum that has been granted to them.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting, on line 6, after the name "N. May Jernegan," the words "and child," so that there may be no doubt about the fact that this child is a beneficiary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is a committee amendment pending. It is not in order to offer another amendment now.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Carolina to give heed. The Chair states that there is a committee amendment pending, and it will not be in order to offer another amendment at this time unless it be to the committee amendment. The Chair understands the gentleman's amendment is not such an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as I recall the history of the granting by special private acts of pensions for $125 to the widows of Drs. Carroll and Lazear, they were provided for in one bill, and the report in this case shows that at least one of them died as a direct result of the yellow-fever experimentation. Dr. Lazear gave up his life in this heroic, noble work of trying to find a means whereby they could check the spread of yellow-fever germs. It would be furthest from my purpose to detract from the heroic work, the work of sacrifice, of this private soldier, Mr. Warren G. Jernegan. If there was any testimony whatsoever to show that he had been afflicted or affected in the slightest degree after his leaving the hospital by subjecting himself to the experimentation of the transfusion of blood from a yellow-fever patient to his own body, I would be the last to object, or if he had died as the result of the experimentation I would be the last to raise any protest. In fact, I would rather favor it, because he was a private soldier. I do not believe in the policy of making distinctions between officers and privates. But we have been here long enough to know that in times past there have been bills passed where they should not have been passed, coupled with another bill, and the House has been swept off its feet.

There can be no criticism of the policy of Congress in voting $125 of a pension to the widow of Dr. Lazear, but I say it is wrong as a matter of principle, where the uncontradicted testimony, shows as admitted by the gentleman who is the author of the bill and the sponsor of the bill on the floor, that the person fully recovered from the effects of his submission to these tests, worked for the Government many years afterwards on the Canal Zone, and as far as the record shows was in perfect health, died in no way as the result of his submission to this test, that we should now, just because, perchance, he has an invalid child and a mother who is somewhat invalided—that we should grant that mother a pension of $125. Why, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, a Spanish-American War veteran—and I have not the honor to be that—there are many soldiers, and you in your districts know of many instances, who went down into the swamp-infested districts of the South, and in Porto Rico, where they contracted malaria and suffered afterwards——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. I mean out of the time of the opposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WOODRUFF. Reserving the right to object, who controls the time in opposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He does not.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it assumed that the time consumed will be taken out of the time allotted for the opponents of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Many are the instances of soldiers who came from Porto Rico after that campaign who had contracted malaria, and who for years and years afterwards, and perhaps even to this day, have not ever fully recovered from those ill effects, men who have been married, and whose widows with the same good grace could come before this body and ask for a higher pension than is being granted under the general rules of the Committee on Pensions. If there was any proof at all to show that this man suffered at all as a result of his submission to these tests, it would be a different proposition, but certainly in 18 years of life, with the record showing that he had fully recovered, you can not vote a pension of $125 merely upon conjecture, and that is what I claim this is.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. COLTON. Does the gentleman recognize any difference in principle between this case and the case of Dr. Reed and Dr. Carroll?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not recall now from memory the circumstances surrounding our granting of a pension to Dr. Carroll. As I recall, and as I stated, the widows of Dr. Carroll and Dr. Lazear were taken care of in one bill, and it was suggested on the floor here that these men gave up their lives. As to one, the testimony was positive, and it is confirmed in this report here, that Dr. Lazear gave up his life in this great humanitarian work. I do not recall what the facts were so far as Dr. Carroll is concerned, nor do I recall the facts so far as Dr. Walter Reed is concerned. But here we have a special case, where there is no evidence whatsoever showing the connection between these experiments and his death, or even showing that he was in poor health as the result of this experimentation on his body. It is easy enough to vote pensions, and they can come back as precedents to haunt us. But I think we are going pretty far when we vote $125, which is merely to this widow. I would not withhold voting to the widow some reasonable amount more than $12 per month. It has been suggested that we change this so as to include the child. Oh, well, if the child is in weak health for some unknown reason—and who is there to state what the cause of the infirmity of the child is?—and the child passes away, or when he reaches a majority gets married, the amount of money, the pension, is no longer awarded to the child, but is awarded to the widow, is there anything in the record that shows that this widow's health has in any way been impaired by the fact that she married this soldier, which was in 1901, a few months after the experimentation, and lived and cohabited with him for 18 years afterwards? I think there is nothing to support that position.

The bill as originally reported carries the provision that this special pension of $125 was to be in special recognition of the services rendered by the soldier in assisting in the discovery of means of preventing, as well as ascertaining the cause and method of propagation of, yellow fever. They have eliminated that and have awarded this widow $125.

I have nothing against the position assumed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], as the Members of this House know, in endeavoring to award a proper pension according to the policy of the House; but I thought we ought to have a larger attendance here, so as to call it to the attention of the House and let the Members of the House determine as to what the policy should be, whether it should be extended or not.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HAMMER. Does the gentleman take the position that these unusual circumstances, when one person volunteers, when the scientific world was trying to ascertain the means of controlling the ravages of this dreadful disease—does the gentleman mean to take the position that this poor widow, who is now getting only $12 a month, the widow of one man who had the courage to go through that trying odeal that would shatter the nerves of the strongest man living, that because we are not at this time able to state the cause of his death or the physical condition that was probably inherited by the child on account of the nervous strain to which the father was subjected by sleeping in the clothes of people suffering from this disease—does the gentleman claim that we ought to deny that widow a reasonable amount to keep her from dire want?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman had done me the credit to listen to my remarks he would know I had stated that I thought there was ground for granting her an increase of pension beyond $12.

But the gentleman assumes too much in his statement as to the facts. There is nothing in the record to show that this soldier was the sole, lone person that offered his life in this regard; there is nothing whatsoever in the record to show that he was the only person. If the gentleman from North Carolina had read the report he would have found that this soldier did not suffer at all by reason of sleeping in the clothes of yellow-fever patients. He did not suffer at all from that experimentation.

If the gentleman had read the report further, he would have found that this soldier was in the hospital as the result of this innoculation only 10 days, from January 8, 1901, to January 18, 1901, when he was dismissed as a well man, and the further record of his service with the Government—and there is not one iota of testimony to controvert it—is that for 18 years he was a well man. Let us not be swayed by sentiment and say that the Treasury of the United States is able to take care of every possible case. It is, but the taxpayers ultimately pay the expense. The facts are that this soldier was a well man. He may have married an invalid wife. She is an invalid to-day. The only report shows that she is an invalid. Does the gentleman deny it?

Mr. McSWAIN. I deny that she is an invalid. What does the record say?

Mr. STAFFORD. In the gentleman's own language the evidence submitted shows that the claimant is afflicted with varicose veins and unable to work regularly. I conclude from that statement that she is an invalid.

Mr. HAMMER. From varicose veins?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; from varicose veins. Inasmuch as we had in the past granted a pension of $125 to the widow of an officer in the Army who had thus sacrificed his life, if there were an iota of testimony in this record to show that in any way this soldier had been affected by his submission to these tests I would favor this bill. No distinction should be made between privates and officers. There are many privates who faced gunfire and who were the victims of fever contracted in Porto Rico who died as a result of disabilities traceable to that source whose widows are receiving only $12 a month. Shall we go wild and vote $125 a month on conjecture and sympathy?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this pension ought, in my judgment, to be granted to the widow and invalid child of this private soldier, Jernegan, because of the immeasurable service he rendered to humanity.

Members of the House will remember the former terrible ravages of yellow fever. At one time it went up the Mississippi Valley killing its victims by the thousands and at last reached Memphis, where people died so fast that there were not sufficient coffins in which to bury them.

No words can adequately describe, I once heard Gen. Leonard Wood say in conversation at Fort Myer, the horrors of yellow fever at Santiago de Cuba. He told how every day persons died by scores, and how he and his assistants put the bodies in heaps and poured oil on and burned them. "I did not know then," said the general, "nor did anybody in the world know, whether that horrible disease was propagated by contagion or by inoculation; by mere contact or by first entering the blood." Gen. Wood said that afterwards when he was in Habana in command of Cuba, he and his officers felt that it had become absolutely necessary to find some remedy for that disease. He described how they asked for volunteers to make the great experiment to decide the question of contagion and inoculation. He told of the men who volunteered.

When I said to Gen. Leonard Wood, "That was a brave thing for them to do," he replied, "Mr. COOPER, you may search all the annals of war and you can not find an instance of more heroic bravery."

Jernegan was one of those heroes. What did he do? Here is a little of his story, told officially by Roger Post Ames, surgeon, United States Army, late attending surgeon, United States Army yellow fever commission:

> He entered two experiments, namely, by sleeping 21 nights in a room without ventilation and covered with soiled clothing from yellow fever dead, and at the same time wore the night clothing of the recently sick from that dreadful disease. The result of this experiment fully demonstrated that clothing does not convey the germs. In experiment No. 2 Mr. Jernegan permitted blood to be taken from the vein of a malignant yellow fever subject and the same injected into his system. As a result within three days he was desperately ill with yellow fever.

And says M. W. Ireland, Surgeon General, United States Army:

> The records show that he was one of the men who volunteered to sleep in a room with foul clothes and bedding which had been used for yellow fever patients, with a view to demonstrating that the fever was not transmitted by contact with such articles. The records also show that Warren G. Jernegan afterwards submitted to mosquito inoculation on two different occasions, December 28, 1900, and again on December 29, 1900, the result being negative. The records show that he volunteered for blood injection on Januaray 4, 1901, with a positive result, and was taken sick on January 8, 1901. He was a patient in the hospital from January 8, 1901, to January 18, 1901, suffering with yellow fever.
> Through the experiments conducted in Cuba, and which were made possible by the volunteering of certain individuals, the late Maj. Walter Reed and his associates were able to demonstrate that yellow fever was transmitted by a certain species of mosquito. As soon as this fact was proven it was a comparatively easy matter to control the ravage of this disease, which had demanded such a tremendous toll in human lives and which had cost the Governments of the Western Hemisphere millions of dollars in a commercial way every year.

The name of Maj. Walter Reed is immortal in the annals of heroism and noble service to mankind. His widow deserves and receives a pension of $125 a month. But she deserves it no more than does the widow of Jernegan, the private soldier.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, going back to the Senate report that was made at the time the bills were being considered for pensioning the widows of Dr. Carroll and Dr. Lazear, we find that they were pensioned at the rate of $125 a month. Then we find this information, to which I wish to call the special attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]:

> Dr. Lazear was not infected at this time—
> Referring to the time that the experiments were made—
> due to the fact that the conditions necessary to the transmission of the disease by the mosquito were not yet understood, but he was bitten while working in the yellow-fever ward somewhat later, and died a martyr of science, working in behalf of humanity. This was the only fatality which occurred in these experiments.

They did a wonderful work. He did subject himself to the experiment as Dr. Carroll did, and so did the husband of the widow for whom we are asking a pension to-day subject himself to the same. Not one time, but two times did he do that, while hundreds and thousands were dying as the result of this disease, and then a third time he subjected himself to the inoculation and contracted the disease. This occurred a year later.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does the gentleman get the information that he subjected himself a third time? It was all one occasion, in the latter part of 1900, December 28, 1900, to January 18, 1901. He was in the hospital only 10 days, fully recovered and discharged a well man, so the report shows, and died years afterwards of pneumonia.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If I am mistaken, I stand corrected, but I thought it was a third time. At least he was inoculated on two different occasions and contracted the disease.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly point out where is his warrant for saying this man was inoculated twice? I have not been able to find any such reference.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I will find it and ask recognition a little later.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, everybody who goes to war is liable to be killed. We have certain fixed rules for the pensioning of soldiers and their widows; but occasions arise when men are called upon for extraordinary and special duty, accompanied by special danger, and they volunteer. By general consent we have fixed a much higher rate of pension as a reward and return for those men. Then, in addition to that there are occasions when men are asked to go out and commit suicide, as in the case of this man. At least three bills seem to have been passed in matters of this kind, and they have fixed the amount at $125. The basis is laid. We are just following a precedent, and all we have to do is to treat them all alike, which is just.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has stated that there is no evidence that this husband and father passed anything on to his child. He appears to have been very well. But, gentlemen, we all know that the most dreadful disease in the world is one that seems now to yield to treatment, and men who contract that disease in the wildness of their youth apparently are entirely cured, and die from other causes, but yet their children and grandchildren suffer from the disease. The effects come out in future generations. The good Book tells us that the sins of the fathers shall be visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], a very intelligent, sensible man, suggests that from what he has seen he gathers the view that this child inherits from his father a weakness as the result of his father's illness from yellow fever, although it did not manifest itself in the father.

I think it is quite as probable that the gentleman is right as it is in the case of those children who suffer from the effects of this other disease which I have mentioned. It is quite absurd to think that any man can take his life in his hands and go and contract yellow fever and come out of it as good as he went in. Ninety per cent of the men who go to war and campaign to any great extent never entirely recover. They carry all through their lives some weakness somewhere that frequently comes out, and you can not tell me that any man could go down there and get yellow fever without being somewhat the worse for it. If the result did not appear in him, it might appear in his children, as in this case. But what of it, anyway? Dr. Reed performed his splendid service down in Cuba, and came out of it and died afterwards of appendicitis. Does anyone claim he contracted appendicitis while developing the scientific principles applicable to the eradication of yellow fever? Yet his family gets this pension. Whenever these people go out and dare death for the benefit of mankind, you have got to take off your hat and quit discussing the thing along the line of pure logic. [Applause.] If there is any man here that will commit suicide, providing his wife and children get $125 a month, I will vote against the bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin I want to read from the letter of Surg. Gen. Ireland, who says:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, February 15, 1921.

MRS. WARREN G. JERNEGAN,
Spartanburg, S. C.

MY DEAR MRS. JERNEGAN: I have known for many years of the self-sacrificing spirit which Warren G. Jernegan exhibited in Cuba when experiments were being made to determine the mode of transmission of yellow fever. The records show that he was one of the men who volunteered to sleep in a room with foul clothes and bedding which had been used for yellow fever patients, with a view to demonstrating that the fever was not transmitted by contact with such articles.

I will call this exposure No. 1.

The records also show that Warren G. Jernegan afterwards submitted to mosquito inoculation on two different occasions, December 28, 1900, and again on December 29, 1900, the result being negative.

I will call these exposures Nos. 2 and 3.

The records show that he volunteered for blood injection on January 4, 1901, with a positive result, and was taken sick on January 8, 1901. He was a patient in the hospital from January 8, 1901, to January 18, 1901, suffering with yellow fever.

I will call this exposure No. 4.

Now, he did contract the disease in helping to carry out these experiments. He offered himself on four different occasions wholly in the interest of science, and now you deny to his widow a pension of $125, whereas the officer's widow has received $125, and I think this one is entitled to it, although the widow of a private.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, can not the gentleman recognize the distinction between awarding the widow of an officer who dies as a result of injury contracted during service in the Army, not being inoculated for yellow fever, and one, even though he did sacrifice himself and submit to an experiment of inoculation of the blood of a former yellow-fever patient, who continued in the service 10 years afterwards and whose military record does not show that he suffered at all from the effects of that experimentation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in order to make it absolutely certain that the child is to receive the benefit of the pension, at the suggestion of our venerable friend, Mr. CANNON, I move to amend by striking out "N. May Jernegan" and the words "widow of," in line 6, and insert "Warren G. Jernegan, jr., son of Warren G. Jernegan."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1 of the bill, in line 6 strike out the word "N. May Jernegan, widow of," and insert in lieu thereof "Warren G. Jernegan, jr., son of."

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this amendment. The gentleman says this man was a private. There were thousands of privates in 1898. The gentleman from South Carolina says this man was a volunteer; there were thousands of volunteers in 1898. There were thousands of men who came back from Cuba in 1898 suffering from the effects of yellow fever and malaria—thousands never worked full time on account of the effects of malaria. There were thousands of men whose deaths resulted from the effects of malaria. I have been on the Pension Committee, and you will find hundreds of cases where men died on account of malaria and because of that left their children affected. Yet, we grant these boys and these girls a pension of only $2 a month, and then only until they reach the age of 16. Here you are going to give a boy $125 a month. We only give $2 a month when the evidence shows absolutely that the death of the father came from the effects of malaria or other disease or wounds contracted or received in service. The evidence in this case shows very clearly that his death did not result from disease contracted in the service. If the widow had been able to prove that his death was the result of service she would be getting $25 a month instead of $12 a month. The committee themselves are not satisfied that the party is entitled to any special recognition, because they themselves have stricken out the language which entitled him to special recognition. There is hardly a Member of Congress here who does not have applications for a special pension. I myself have a case where a widow is over 90 years of age, whose husband gave his life to his country, and she can not get any more than $30 per month. Under the rules of the Pension Committee and the pension laws we do not allow more than $30 a month. I sincerely hope that you will not give $125 a month to a boy when other boys whose fathers have died in the service or from disease contracted in the service only get $2 a month.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, my friend fails to recognize the distinction between the ordinary hazards of the soldier and the peculiar and practically suicidal proposition of the man who volunteers for these hazardous experiments, as Col. LITTLE, of Kansas, a soldier of experience as well as of daring, says that the rule has been fixed in the cases of Walter Reed, James Carroll, and Jesse W. Lazear.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. No matter what position we may take on the original bill, we certainly should not adopt a new precedent in this House and award the child of a soldier who submitted to this risky experiment a pension of $125 a month, and then later permit the widow to come to this House with another bill and under the example of precedent that we have awarded the widow of an Army officer $125 a month under like circumstances get another $125 a month, making in all for the family $250 a month. Regardless of what position you take on the bill you should vote down the pending amendment to substitute the son's name for the widow's. I am not in any way directly interested, as the Members know, in the defeat of this bill, but I think we all do not wish to establish a precedent by voting $125 to a son, not knowing when he may recover his full health, to remain on the pay roll with a gratuity for years and years, accepting an honorarium to which he may not be entitled at all.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I was not in the Chamber when the amendment was offered. What is it?

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment is to substitute the name of the son, who is 16 years old, and who is attending a private school, for that of the widow, and allow this pension to him for the rest of his life.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. In the case of a man who died from malaria contracted in the service we pay the child only $2 a month up to the time it is 16 years of age, but here is a case where it is proposed to give $125 a month to a son so long as he lives.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can see the outrageous policy attempted to be pursued, to vote to one person, a child of a deceased soldier, who happens to be in poor health, $125 a month, when under the general law we vote only $2 a month, even though the latter may be children of soldiers who died from disease contracted in the service, and then the $2 a month is to be paid only until they are 16 years of age.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am bound to admit that this bill presents something different from the ordinary pension. It is true we have a large pension roll already. The Government has very properly pensioned men who have carried our flag to victory, carried it for the preservation of the Government of American institutions, and for the safeguarding of American civilization. The glory and grandeur of our country is, after all, found in the health, strength, and the efficiency of its men and women. We hope there will be no more wars. We fervently pray that the peace conference about to meet will bring about an era of universal peace, and then, instead of pensioning the heroes of war, it will be the heroes of peace that will claim our attention; those heroes who may voluntarily give their lives that the race may grow stronger and greater. Such awards as this bill proposes present a different appeal to our generosity, and this Government can well afford to go on record as favoring a liberal policy toward its citizens who offer themselves for this unselfish kind of service. Let us hope that the American heroes of the future may be heroes of peace, heroes who give themselves that the race may be strengthened and human diseases eliminated. [Applause.]

The science of medicine, Mr. Speaker, is yet in its infancy. A great deal has been accomplished, a great deal is yet to be accomplished. We have a wonderful America, but it would be a mighty poor America if it were peopled by a race of invalids. The wealth of America is not to be measured by her great cities, fertile farms, railroads, institutions, and industries. The real wealth of America is the health, strength, and character of her men and women. The men who offer themselves as martyrs for the advancement of medical science ought to be recognized, and this Congress will make no mistake in passing this bill and by its action to-day say, "Thus do we honor the heroes in the interest of humanity and progress." There will never be many awards of this nature and it can not be maintained that the precedent is unwise. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pending amendment for the purpose of offering another, after conference with some gentlemen who are friends of the measure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: Page 2, after the word "receiving," in line 3, insert: "Provided, That one-third of the pension allowed by this act shall be for the benefit of the child until he shall reach the age of 21 years."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 2, strike out the figures "$125" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$50."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 32, noes 70.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum voting and that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 46, nays 203, answered "present" 3, not voting 179, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

The question was taken and the Speaker pro tempore announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House again divided and there were, ayes 137, noes 28.

So the bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the title of the bill will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. MCSWAIN a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have recently had a conversation with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the first conversation or communication of any character that has passed between us since the resolution for his expulsion was presented to the House. I understand from the conversation which I have had with the gentleman from Texas that in the 17th line of the second column of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday, page 7667, there are four words, the denial of the use of which he does not make, but which were made, if made at all——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two more minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And which were made, if made at all, in what might be termed the heat of debate, or at least the stress of speaking under which he was laboring at the time, that gave to his remarks a meaning different from that which he intended to convey. I refer to the four words in the line, column, and on the page mentioned, "Just as it is," and in behalf of the gentleman from Texas I ask unanimous consent that those words may be stricken from the permanent RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas was talking deliberately when those words were uttered. They were uttered. They indicate his purpose and intent at the time they were uttered. I do not think it is fair to the House that the RECORD shall be altered. I think it should stand as it was made, and I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Can a motion be made to the effect intended to be accomplished by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]? Can a motion be made to strike out those four words?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from New York yet.

Mr. LONDON. I asked whether a motion can be made to strike out the four words mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in receipt of a communication addressed to the Speaker of the House and which the writer of the communication has requested should be laid before the House to-day. The Chair after conference with the majority leader, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and the minority leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], feels that the request of the writer of the communication is entitled to be recognized, and therefore directs the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

OCTOBER 28, 1921.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am involved in no issue now before the House, hence what I now say is not a sacrifice of any principle.

When I expressed a wish of being able to place before the country the record expunged, I was misunderstood by my colleagues, who believed that I would circulate the objectionable language. My intention was not to do this, but to circulate the expunged record with all the objectionable words and abbreviations contained in the employee's affidavit eliminated, and circulated only to show to the country the honest bona fide purpose of my remarks.

I realize that the judgment of no human is infallible. I bow to the collective judgment of my colleagues, against none of whom I harbor malice, and offer this my apology to the House for what my colleagues in their decision determined was an error.

Very sincerely,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

[Applause.]

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

HUBERT REYNOLDS.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2003) for the relief of Hubert Reynolds.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Hubert Reynolds, postmaster at Greeley, Colo., in the sum of $69,300, due to the United States on account of war-savings stamps, on account of losses resulting from burglary of said post office on December 26, 1918.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill for the relief of the postmaster at Greeley, Colo. On the night of December 26, 1918, the assistant postmaster at that office, who had come back to figure up his accounts, left the office in which the vault was located for a few minutes to step out into the workroom and handle with four other clerks the incoming mail.

It was in the Christmas rush period, and because of the Christmas rush, and because of influenza prevalent at the time, there was a shortage of help. He was only 45 feet away from his room, and could see if anyone went into it from the outside, but it appears that during the time he was gone some burglar or burglars were able to get in by sawing off a lock in the basement, getting into the coal bin, and from the coal bin, by prying open a door, getting up into the lookout and into the room of the assistant postmaster, where these stamps were in the vault. Sixty-nine thousand three hundred dollars' worth of war-savings stamps were taken. The assistant postmaster felt that in stepping out to be gone but a few minutes to sort the mail that it was safe not to lock that vault. In any case the stamps are gone, and while there may be a difference of opinion as to whether or not the assistant postmaster exercised proper care, surely it is not the assistant postmaster to-day who is being punished. Here are those stamps, $69,300 worth, charged up to the postmaster at Greeley, Colo., and the bill provides that the postmaster shall be entitled to credit. I might say, as to the assistant postmaster, that his resignation was asked for. The postmaster is still occupying the office at Greeley, Colo. If this bill does not pass, it will be punishing the postmaster, who was in no wise to blame and who had been at the office all of that day, and was at his home when this happened, between 8 and 9 o'clock of the evening of December 26, 1918. The committee are of the opinion that no blame can be attached to the postmaster, and that he should receive credit.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLYNN. Surely.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman stated that the vault was within view of the assistant postmaster from the place where he was working, or that the door leading into the office where the vault was located was within view of the place where he was working. Where is there any statement in the report to support that position?

Mr. GLYNN. My recollection is that that was the evidence submitted. My impression was that it was in the report. It is my recollection that that is the evidence submitted before the committee. As a matter of fact, the burglars did not go through this door. They went through what is called the lookout, which is only used by post-office inspectors or by the postmaster. There is a secret passage to the lookout, which gives a post-office inspector or a supervisory official a chance to look into the workroom. The door through which they would ordinarily go, I am very certain, was within view of the assistant postmaster.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would say to the gentleman, while I have not read every line of the entire report containing all the testimony, still I have read a substantial portion of it, and I think the gentleman is not only in error as to that particular statement but is in error as to the other statement, that he was only away from his own office, which contained the vault, and the vault unlocked, and with the door of the safe unlocked which contained these war-savings stamps, more than half an hour.

Mr. GLYNN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the testimony shows that the burglars went in through the lookout.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not dispute the fact that they got in there by way of the basement window.

Mr. GLYNN. I think it is true that the evidence will show that he was away more than half an hour, but that he was within 40 feet, all of this time, of that vault.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I read to the gentleman in his time just what the letter of the Postmaster General shows as to the situation under which he was working. I read on page 2 of the report, the first paragraph of the letter of the Postmaster General as printed on that page:

> He had opened the vault door and was attending to his own work until the arrival of an evening mail, when he entered the workroom to assist the mailing clerks in distributing the mail, which special work would have required less than a half hour. Being only about 40 feet from his own room and practically within hearing distance, he left the vault door open, especially because he expected to return to his room in so short a time.

There is nothing so far as I find that the workroom gave him an opportunity to see the open door which led into his office, and the record shows, if I remember the testimony and the report—and I have not read it for several months—that he was engaged with the clerks much more than half an hour, with no one in the private inner office standing guard whatsoever, no clerk in the office, with the vault door open, and also the private safe door open.

Mr. GLYNN. Assuming for the purpose of argument that the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin is true, this is not a bill for the relief of the assistant postmaster. The postmaster is charged up with this $69,300 worth of stamps. The question is, Was there negligence on the part of the postmaster? Here is an assistant postmaster who had been in that office for years, and presumably during that time had been watchful and careful. He was not only assistant postmaster at this time, but he had been assistant postmaster for years under the predecessor of the then postmaster. The postmaster himself was at his home. It was nearly 9 o'clock at night. There would be a difference of opinion whether he would believe it was necessary to lock the door while knowing the outside door was locked, and my recollection is that where he was working he was in sight of the only door that led into his office, except through the lookout. If we do not pass this bill, it means that a postmaster who in the opinion of the committee was not negligent will be charged up with $69,300 worth of war savings stamps.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GLYNN. Surely.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. May I also add that the assistant postmaster, who was primarily responsible, was under civil service, so that the postmaster himself did not choose him. He was furnished to the postmaster by the Government in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GLYNN. The fact that the Post Office Department called for the resignation of the assistant postmaster might indicate that they had felt he had not exercised due care.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GLYNN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. What protection, upon that kind of a theory, would the people or the Government have at all? I understand the postmaster is responsible for the acts of his assistants.

Mr. GLYNN. I think there may be something in that, but you would not want to be responsible for the acts of your assistant if you had nothing to say as to the selection of that assistant. If you are going to be held responsible for the action of your assistants you want to come pretty near having something to say about who your assistants are to be.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLYNN. Certainly.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would like to ask the gentleman if the committee in their investigation decided that it was the fault of the Civil Service Commission rules that resulted in this loss to the United States Government?

Mr. GLYNN. No; we did not go into that. We felt—and it was our opinion—that here, when these stamps disappeared, the postmaster ought not to be charged with negligence. The amount covers I do not know how many times the salary, but I suspect that 20 years' salary would not pay for the amount of these stamps.

Mr. CLOUSE. What does the gentleman say about laying this down as a precedent, exculpating this postmaster for this loss? What would be the result of cases similar to this?

Mr. GLYNN. The assistant postmaster, who was directly responsible, when he was acting as postmaster in the absence of the postmaster himself, has been removed. His resignation has been asked for. I suspect that the present assistant postmaster is not going to go out and leave that safe door open even for five minutes.

Mr. CLOUSE. What did your committee find out or ascertain with reference to the solvency of the assistant postmaster? What is his financial position? Is he able to reimburse the postmaster for his palpable negligence?

Mr. GLYNN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE], who is informed as to the details of this matter.

Mr. CLOUSE. I would like to know, because I think that is a question that the postmaster would have liked to pursue, and bring suit against this assistant for his negligence there.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some statements with reference to this case, which has come under my personal knowledge, it being within my congressional district. I have taken every pains to investigate this case personally for myself. I can state at the outset that I have a personal acquaintance not only with the postmaster there but also with the assistant postmaster, whom I have known from the time he was a little boy in school, at the age of 8 or 10 years. I know his parents, than whom there were no more respectable or influential citizens in that portion of the country. I knew the young man who was acting postmaster in that office several years prior to his being selected for the position by the present postmaster, Mr. Reynolds, when he was a teacher in the public schools, and his reputation is beyond reproach.

Answering the questions propounded as to his financial standing, I will say that he is working daily for his living. He has his own home. He has raised a family of five or six children and is educating them in the schools of the State.

Mr. CLOUSE. The question I asked was directed wholly as to the assistant postmaster.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is the one of whom I am speaking, and of his financial ability. He would not be able in any way to make compensation if he were at fault, or if the postmaster claimed him to be at fault and should demand reparation it would be impossible for him to make reparation financially.

But I want to say that the postmaster himself does not attach one iota of fault to this assistant postmaster. Probably he was derelict from the fact that he left his office and went out to assist those who were attending to the sorting of the mails coming in on a late train, at a time when the city was down with the "flu," when it was impossible to get extra assistance and the force of the office was unable to take care of the congested condition of the mail. It is a city of fifteen or sixteen thousand people. The building in which this robbery took place is an up-to-date building, costing something like $250,000, equipped with all the devices thought necessary by the Treasury Department, so as to allow the inspectors to come into the building unnoticed and climb to the cupola, from which they could observe the workings inside the office without themselves being observed.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield.

Mr. CLOUSE. I will ask the gentleman to say whether or not it is required for the assistant postmasters to make a bond to the postmaster for the faithful performance of his duties?

Mr. GLYNN. The assistant postmaster and the clerks and carriers all file a bond with the Government and with the postmaster.

Mr. CLOUSE. Then, would it not be possible for the Government to reimburse itself on the bond that this assistant postmaster gave for the faithful performance of his duties?

Mr. GLYNN. While it would be possible, yet with all the efforts of the inspectors and the inspectors in charge—they were around there as thick as bees around a sugar barrel—they have not been able to attach any charge of negligence upon the assistant postmaster, so that reparation could be demanded on his part, so that they could resort to his bond.

Mr. CLOUSE. Were there no rules as to when the vault should be opened?

Mr. GLYNN. There was no rule. The fact is that this man came back after supper, and——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not mean to say that there is any rule of the Post Office Department that permits the safe there to be left open when there is no one in the office?

Mr. GLYNN. As to that, as to the time, the assistant postmaster might be there at midnight, and if he is, the door might be open.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether, under the rules and regulations—although I do not speak positively as to that—whether the postmaster or the assistant postmaster has authority to leave the doors near a vault or the doors of the safe open after working hours.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I think that was reprehensible. I acknowledge that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that when a postmaster assumes that position he takes it with full knowledge of the rules and regulations of the department, and knows that he assumes the risk for the assistant postmaster? It is clear that the purpose of putting up a bond is to cover any possible loss, regardless of how it occurs, if it can be traced to negligence of postmaster or employees. The mere fact that he had a negligent assistant postmaster in no way exculpates the principal in this case, who was the postmaster. Otherwise, the Government has no protection against the negligence of the assistant postmaster.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. As a matter of fact, is not the bond of the postmaster taken as security against his defalcation?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The gentleman is asking me a technical question.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Does the gentleman know that in many other instances, where a principal Government official was not directly at fault, where there was a default on the part of a subordinate in the civil service, Congress has passed relief bills almost uniformly in cases of this kind?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. There is no question about that, and I beg to state that I was informed by an official in the Post Office Department that the matter stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON] is a fact, that the postmaster gives a bond against any unlawful act on his part, but that it does not go further than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman positive about that?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. That is what I am informed.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman think that the bond given by the postmaster covers only his delinquency and not the delinquencies of his subordinates?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I can not answer that. It is a technical question.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it a technical question?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It is a question of law into which I have not examined.

When this burglary occurred in 1918 I personally inspected conditions in that office, and I felt justified in introducing a bill for the relief of this postmaster, and I introduced H. R. 6892 on June 28, 1919. I did this after consulting the department and finding out that under the law the Postmaster General is not permitted to settle cases of this kind where the loss exceeds $10,000, and I was informed that in order to bring this to Congress it would be necessary to introduce a special bill. This I did, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. By the chairman of that committee it was referred to a subcommittee of which the gentleman from New York, Mr. McKiniry, was the chairman. Mr. McKiniry investigated this case very carefully. He expressed a desire to question the postmaster and his assistant personally. For that purpose they came here to Washington and appeared before this subcommittee and accounted fully to that committee, I believe to the entire satisfaction of the committee, so that the committee were convinced that no fault could be found with the action of either the postmaster or the assistant postmaster, and a favorable report would have been filed with the committee except for the fact that Congress adjourned. Only a verbal report was made, so that there is no written or printed report on file with the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAYTON. This theft or embezzlement, or whatever you call it, took place in 1918?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. December 26, 1918, just at the Christmas holidays.

Mr. LAYTON. That gives some hope for some of the rest of us who have bills.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Can the gentleman state what was the character of the bond given by the postmaster? Was it a personal bond or a surety bond?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. It was a surety bond for $15,000, as I understand.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I am at a loss to understand why this claim should come here. A postmaster is not an insurer of the property in his possession. He is merely custodian of it. If a thief breaks in and steals and carries away that property he is not liable upon his bond. True, he is charged with the stamps in the first instance. But why should he not now be credited by the department with the value of the stamps that were stolen?

Mr. MADDEN. The department has not the authority to do that.

Mr. GLYNN. All this bill asks is that he be credited with this amount.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. On page 15 of the report of the inspectors I see the following:

> Under sections 256 and 317, Postal Laws and Regulations of 1913, supplemented by section 87, Book of Instructions to Post Office Inspectors, as construed, on February 13, 1919, we made formal written demands upon United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., Baltimore, Md., and upon American Surety Co. of New York, for $3,500 and $15,000, respectively, those being the amounts of official bonds of assistant postmaster and postmaster, issued by said companies in the order mentioned.

Can the gentleman state whether or not anything has been collected from these bondsmen?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Nothing has been collected. Any action looking toward the collection of those bonds has been held in abeyance by the Post Office Department awaiting the action of Congress.

Mr. BLACK. If we should pass this bill allowing the full amount as a credit to the postmaster, is it the purpose of the Post Office Department to sue for recovery upon these bonds?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I could not state with reference to that.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. They could not sue until they did that.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I may say that if we release the principal we can not hold the surety, as a matter of law.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman has raised a very interesting point there, and it is evident we are proceeding too fast here in allowing this claim until the liability of the surety is exhausted. If we should fail in such a suit and are unable to recover from the surety, it occurs to me that it will be soon enough then to pass a bill relieving the postmaster.

Mr. EDMONDS. My colleague knows that bonds are given for the faithful and honest performance of duties. In the case of a robbery like this if the man did not follow the regulations of the department, if we relieve the charge against him of all liability, then the sureties would be relieved.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think this is an inopportune time to pass this bill? Does he not think that we had better lay it aside until the department determines in a suit or by agreement what the liability of the surety companies are? If we collect of the surety company, then we do not have to pass the bill to relieve the postmaster, or at least for so much as is paid by the surety company.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to answer the gentleman in this way: The regulations require that when a man leaves the room where the safe is the day door shall be locked on the safe. They do not require him to put the night lock on until he has finished and leaves for the night. But when he leaves the office in the daytime where the safe is he shall have the day door locked. Of course, locking the day door would not have prevented the man getting into the safe, but in the rush of business the assistant postmaster went outside of the door, men came in through the back way, which is quite unusual, got down into the office, and robbed the safe. When they turned off the electric light and the postmaster was going back, he locked the safe the first thing. But the robbery had taken place.

Mr. BLACK. The point I am making is, if the gentleman will permit, we are assuming in advance that the sureties are not liable. Now, we have no statement from the Post Office Department officials that they do not regard the sureties as liable on the bond. We have no assurance from anybody that the state of facts are such as to relieve the sureties, and until we have an assurance of that fact we ought not to pass the bill and release the principal, which, of course, would release the sureties.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. In the case cited by the gentleman from Texas, the surety after paying would at once have recourse against the postmaster and exhaust his funds.

Mr. BLACK. We are not here inquiring into the liability of the principal to the sureties.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is the point. It appears to me that it would be unfair and unjust to hold the postmaster for the loss that occurred through no fault of his. If the Government should recover against the sureties, then, under the law of principal and surety, the sureties could recover of him and he would have to pay over and we would not relieve him at all. It would be indirectly holding him responsible for the loss that he is not responsible for.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to suggest that the sureties would not be liable unless the principal obligor was also liable, and it is useless to talk about releasing the sureties unless you also release the principal, the primary person involved.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the principle of law which the gentleman from North Dakota and the gentleman from Texas have been discussing has been entirely settled in the procedure of the department and this committee for years. The plan used by the committee now is the same pursued in all similar legislalation. In the first place, no postmaster is liable for the negligence of people for whom he is not responsible by his authorization to perform certain duties. If there is a civil-service officer pushed onto a postmaster, who becomes negligent, then the postmaster is not liable at all for that. The department has long since reached that conclusion, and in five years in which I have been somewhat familiar with this class of bills the department has never attempted to enforce that obligation on postmasters' bonds in such cases as this, as far as I know. In this case the committee has supported the department; there has been no effort by the department to prevent this legislation. They have had three years in which to sue on the bond.

Not only is the postmaster not responsible for the misdeeds of somebody that he did not select, but neither are his bondsmen. If he is not responsible they would not be responsible. If they sued upon all these claims it would precipitate considerable additional expense upon the Government and take a good deal of time. If the department lawyers thought the suggestions that gentlemen make were correct they would have long before this brought suit upon the bond, and this claim would not be here. They do not think so, and they do not bring it. The committee finds the postmaster charged with a lot of stamps. He is not responsible for the loss of the stamps. The assistant was in charge that evening and had as much authority there as if he were the postmaster; he was selected by somebody else and the postmaster is not responsible. In this case there is no evidence to sustain any charge against the postmaster in any particular, and the department has not tried to collect of him. Nobody pretends that he was responsible. As a matter of fact, the assistant was very zealous. What he was doing was working harder than usual, and the chief is not responsible for that. And yet this postmaster is charged with a lot of stamps, the loss of which he is in no way responsible for. It is a matter of settling up the books, as the gentleman from Texas suggests, and the department ought to do it. The department can not without authority credit him with the money, and he comes to Congress and says they do not sue me and I wish my books balanced. The question is whether you are going to do a plain, sensible act of justice or force the department to go through the technical form of bringing two or three lawsuits.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. LITTLE. I am.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Is the gentleman's committee of the opinion that the postmaster is not liable on his bond for this loss?

Mr. LITTLE. As I said, I do not know anything about this particular case. I did not pass on it. I am stating the general principles of law under which we have worked, either correctly or mistakenly. Perhaps we have been wrong all these years.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It appears from this record that this vault door was left open, that the safe was left open in which the stamps were deposited, and that the assistant postmaster went off into another room to attend to some other matters in connection with the office. Does the gentleman contend that under those circumstances the assistant would not be liable under his bond, and that his sureties would not be liable?

Mr. LITTLE. I told the gentleman that I did not know anything about the details of the case, except what I have heard on the floor just now. I was merely undertaking to call attention to the principles of law that have governed all such cases. Of course they do not have to sit on the safe during the night.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LITTLE. If I have the floor; yes.

Mr. BLACK. In view of the fact that the postal laws and regulations prescribe that these valuable stamps and funds shall be kept in a safe, that if the postmaster leaves his office that the day lock shall be put on in the daytime and at night that the night lock shall be put on, does the gentleman think that the postmaster would be negligent if he did not see to it that that was done? If a loss occurred, what protection would the Government have?

Mr. LITTLE. As I said before, I do not pretend to be familiar with the details of this case. I never voted on this particular bill. I am merely stating the general principles, and I gather from what the chairman said that he answered the gentlemans' question. As I said a moment ago, a man does not have to sit on that safe in order to be doing his duty. The evidence seems to show that the safe was locked when the postmaster went home, and that the assistant came in the evening and opened it, as he had a right to in the postmaster's absence, an act for which the chief had no responsibility whatever. He was no more to blame for that opening than he would have been if a burglar had broken in in the night and blown the safe open.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. It occurred to me while listening to this debate to ask the gentleman from Colorado if the committee inquired into whether or not the Government takes out burglary insurance in addition to insurance to protect the Government itself against the cupidity or the dishonesty of officials?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who for many years was connected with the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, would be better informed about that than I. I have not taken that up with the department.

Mr. MADDEN. My own judgment is that they do not take out any burglary insurance, and that it has always been the practice where a burglary occurred, if it could be proved that the official himself had no part in the burglary, to relieve the official of responsibility.

Mr. BLACK. Provided that he had the safe locked.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course I do not know whether that condition was included or not.

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, there are a few more statements that I should like to make in respect to this matter.

Mr. MADDEN. Just one more word in connection with that, if the gentleman will permit. There have been so many burglaries in the post office that I have been wondering whether or not it would not be wise for the Post Office Department to take out burglary insurance. It would save a lot of money and perhaps a lot of litigation. I doubt if it would be possible to collect from any insurance company, however, under the present form of policy in a case of this sort.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few more words in this connection with reference to the conditions of the case. The department asked for the resignation of both the assistant and the postmaster.

Mr. LAYTON. Why did they do that?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I could not answer that question, but that was done. The assistant postmaster protested, but he sent in his resignation. It was accepted by the department. The postmaster sent in his resignation with a strong protest against the department for requesting his resignation until after a full hearing had been held by the agents of the department with reference to the matter. However, he sent in his resignation over the protest or petition from the citizens of Greeley, which I would like to take the time to read. I recognize that the report made in the case is voluminous, and I question whether there are many Members of the House who have read that report. Here is one item showing the esteem in which this postmaster is held in that city, which I feel should go into the record, and I ask the privilege of reading it. I read from that petition to which I have referred:

To the honorable the Postmaster General of the United States:

We, citizens of Greeley and of adjacent territory, receiving our mail at the Greeley post office, respectfully petition the reconsideration of the late action of the Post Office Department of the Government requesting the prompt resignation of Postmaster Hubert Reynolds.

From long acquaintance with Mr. Reynolds and personal knowledge of his honesty, ability, and courtesy to all, his high character, entirely above reproach, the faithful service he has rendered to the Government and the patrons of the office for which we vouch, we take this opportunity to express our deep regret at the action of the department above referred to.

We respectfully represent that we are impressed with the belief that the department, in considering the robbery and burglary of the post office at Greeley, which occurred in December last, did not give sufficient weight to a circumstance for which the postmaster is not to blame and, therefore, committed a grave injustice both to Postmaster Reynolds and to Assistant Postmaster John Harbottle.

The circumstance above referred to is that in the construction of the post-office building at Greeley, Colo., the Treasury Department, having control thereof and apparently for the purpose of enabling inspectors to enter the building, without the knowledge of the employees, to observe their conduct and to report on any possible neglect of duty, thereby gave opportunity to criminals to enter the building and to plan a successful robbery at the most opportune time.

We further respectfully represent that, by virtue of this unfortunate planning of the building, the criminals who were guilty of said robbery and burglary were enabled to take advantage of a particular moment when, because of the intense application of all the employees in the office then present, they could commit a crime which otherwise would not have occurred.

In view of what precedes, we respectfully but most earnestly urge to the attention of the Postmaster General our strong conviction that the course taken by the department is unjust, especially as it tends to cast reflection upon Postmaster Reynolds's faithfulness as an officer of the Government.

Dated at Greeley, Colo., this 31st day of March, A. D. 1919.

That is signed by 186 of the principal business men regardless of politics. The present postmaster is a Democrat. He is a fine man, a fine business man; his character has always been above reproach; I have known him for many years.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I yield.

Mr. LITTLE. Did they reconsider their demand for his resignation?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The department never acted on his resignation. It is in their hands, and he is now performing the duties of the office at that place.

Mr. LITTLE. Let me say in the gentleman's time, that either this man stole this money and ought to be sent to the penitentiary or else he is not responsible for its loss, and the books should be straightened up. That is all there is to it. The department still leaves him in charge?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, that is all there is of it.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. According to the statement made by the gentleman himself, here is a room that people from the outside can have access to, without anyone in the post office observing the fact, constructed for the purpose of ingress and egress of the post-office inspectors and, of course, anyone else if they have the same opportunity. Why did this man put his safe in such a place as that? He might as well have put it on the street. Could he not have found some place safer than that in which to put the safe?

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman must remember that that safe had probably been inspected many times by the Government inspectors, and it was right where they authorized it to be.

Mr. McPHERSON. Technically he is. Technically the postmaster is bound to account to the United States for all the money and property that comes into his hands. If he has a loss, as in this case, that is due in no way to negligence, the liability would run up to $10,000; if in excess of $10,000 he would only be relieved by the bondsmen. This case has been in the hands of the post-office inspector for about three years, and they have been able to find a claim nowhere that anybody connected with this loss, either the postmaster or the assistant postmaster, was guilty of any wrong. The assistant postmaster might be said to be guilty of negligence, but he has no bond and no surety that agreed to pay anything for a loss resulting from negligence. The only man that is sought to be relieved or that can be relieved is the postmaster. Nobody can relieve him but Congress, and it seems to me it would be an awful thing for a Government officer like this postmaster to be held responsible. This is a first-class office; I do not know how many employees he has, but there is one assistant postmaster, and numerous clerks, all of whom by their dishonesty can rob him; he was robbed by somebody in the office or somebody outside of $69,000 worth of property for which he is bound to account. Nobody could claim that in any way he was responsible for this loss. And if public officers who are accounting officers, who have to have a number of employees under them, selected by somebody else, are to be held responsible for their larceny or dishonesty or negligence when he himself is without fault, then it is a dangerous thing for a citizen of the United States to hold one of these offices. The question is not what can be done with the assistant postmaster if he was negligent. In case he is solvent the United States can still recover from him.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. According to the gentleman's statement you are relieving the postmaster of the whole proposition, and he is the only one that is liable at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. He is not the only one that is liable for dishonesty under the terms of that bond. If that assistant postmaster had been guilty of dishonesty or negligence amounting to dishonesty, then his bond would be liable.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If you release this whole obligation——

Mr. McPHERSON. We do not release the liability. The law requires this assistant postmaster to account for it. If the man embezzled money and had a bond for faithfulness in the discharge of his duty, his principal could recover from him, so that no claim would be brought.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The distinction between the principal and the deputy is very different from that between the postmaster and his assistant. It is not parallel under the practice of law.

Mr. McPHERSON. Let us see. The United States has a bond from this assistant postmaster for $3,500; a separate contract between the surety company and the United States, that they will pay so much if the United States loses anything through his lack of faithfulness. Now it has lost $3,500. According to the proof, it has really lost $69,000 as the result of some act of his that is not covered by the bond. Clearly, then, whatever is done with this bill, that surety would be liable if the conditions of the bond were broken.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. I yield.

Mr. GLYNN. In view of the fact that for nearly three years no suit has been brought on that bond, either of the postmaster or of the assistant postmaster, is it not a fair presumption that the Post Office Department can not find negligence which would permit a recovery? Is not that a fair presumption?

Mr. McPHERSON. That is certainly a reasonable presumption. There is this difference, however, as I stated when I called it to the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]: The bond that the postmaster gave for $15,000 is a bond on which recovery could be had. But it would shock the conscience of this Congress; it would be equivalent to holding this postmaster responsible for $15,000, because if the surety company paid his bond, it would have recourse upon him for the loss, and we would have here a bill to reimburse him for the $15,000 he had paid out.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is it known that the Government's loss on this paper that was stolen was $69,000?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes. I understand they were savings stamps.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. They would have to be negotiated for cash. Is that easily done by private individuals in large amounts?

Mr. McPHERSON. I think it could be done by thieves who get possession of them, and the Government has lost $69,000. That is my idea.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. Is this risk that postmasters are likely to assume in this regard resulting in any perceptible falling off in the number of applicants for appointment? [Laughter.]

Mr. McPHERSON. There are a few individuals down in my district who are willing to take those offices and risk it; but I doubt whether they would if this bill fails. And this is the interest, I imagine, that several of us have in this bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, that joke, by the way, comes up every time that one of these cases comes up in this committee, and it is just as good now as it was the first time. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McPHERSON], a very distinguished lawyer, has so thoroughly explained the law in this case that really there is not much more to be said about it. But I have in mind the question of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ], which seemed to me quite pertinent. He inquired directly whether the postmaster would be responsible if the deputy were to blame, and the gentleman from Missouri has explained that he would not be in such a case as this, because he did not select the deputy and had nothing to do with his selection. Some other force of the Government put him in there. I want to go a step further, with the gentleman's permission.

Let us suppose that the postmaster had selected him himself and had put him in there. Let us suppose that the Government sued the postmaster, on the theory that the deputy had stolen this $69,000 and had run off. Now, what would the Government need to prove? In my judgment, that man would come back and say he had used his very best judgment in the selection, and had chosen a well-known, reliable, and sensible man; and if he were able to prove that he had taken proper and reasonable care in selecting an honest man, he probably would not be held liable, because it would be natural for you or me or anybody to go off and leave a man whom we had known for 50 years and leave him in charge. He might go crazy the next day, but the postmaster would not be responsible for that. If this postmaster had selected this deputy and had been able to demonstrate to the court and the jury that when he selected him he had every reason in the world to suppose that he was a proper man to put in there, and that no more care could be used than he used when he selected him, probably no court or no jury would hold his responsible. I think that position would be sustained.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill that I regard as of very great importance to the membership of this House and one that I think we ought to thoroughly understand. I have had only a few minutes in which to look into the report of the committee on this bill, but during the discussion here I have procured the Postal Laws and Regulations governing and prescribing the duties of postmasters in just such cases.

When a postmaster is appointed to an office he shall, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, execute a bond.

I read from section 256 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, which prescribe the conditions of the bond which he is required to execute:

> Every postmaster before entering upon the duties of his office shall give bond with good and approved security, and in such penalty as the Postmaster General shall deem sufficient, conditioned for the faithful discharge of all duties and trusts imposed on him either by law or the rules and regulations of the department.

I find further that a rule has been adopted with reference to these postmasters' duties, and I find at section 361 of the Postal Laws and Regulations this rule. Paragraph 2 of this section reads as follows:

> If the post office is not such a reasonably safe place as to warrant the postmaster in leaving his own funds in it at night, or when the building is unoccupied, all moneys and postage stamps should be removed to a place of greater security. Where stamps and funds are kept in iron safes with combination locks, such safes shall be carefully and completely locked at night, or when the office is left without occupants. No credit will be allowed for losses from safes fastened only with what is termed a day lock or a day combination.

It has been said here that there is no remedy as against the assistant postmaster, who seems to be the individual responsible for the loss. I find under the Postal Laws and Regulations at section 316 that the assistant postmaster is also required to execute a bond conditioned upon the faithful performance of his duties and all rules prescribed by the Post Office Department:

> Assistant postmasters and cashiers at first, second, and third class post offices, and when deemed necessary by the Postmaster General for the better protection of the interests of the Government, any other employees in such offices, shall before entering upon the duties of their office give bond to the United States with good and approved security and in such penalty as the Postmaster General shall prescribe, conditioned for the faithful discharge of all duties and trusts imposed upon them either by law or the rules and regulations of the Post Office Department.

Now, from the law as we find it to be it seems perfectly evident to me that there is a liability on the part of the postmaster as well as on the part of his assistant. In the first place, the postmaster himself violated the rules and regulations of the Post Office Department when he left the funds intrusted to him, in the nighttime, without that safe being securely locked.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GLYNN. The gentleman from Tennessee misunderstands the evidence. The fact is that that safe was locked at night. The postmaster went home. When the assistant postmaster came back after supper, the testimony is that then he, the assistant postmaster, unlocked the vault.

Mr. CLOUSE. I understand. That is the very question I am trying to make myself clearly understood upon. Now, the funds of the United States Government are not intrusted to an assistant postmaster, and when the postmaster is absent from that office it is his duty to keep the safe securely locked if he has a safe furnished by the Government for that purpose, for the security of the funds intrusted to him by the Federal Government.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLOUSE. I will.

Mr. GLYNN. The gentleman can look through the postal laws and regulations from cover to cover and he will find no such regulation. As a matter of fact the postmaster can not be there all the time. There are stamps to be sold. They must be taken out. Change must be made. There is no office in the country of any size where the vault can be kept locked when the postmaster is not there. It would simply be a jerk office that would do that.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will ask if the regulations just read about the locking of the safe did not provide that it should be locked only when the post office was not occupied by the employees?

Mr. CLOUSE. If I understand the English language it provides that such safes shall be carefully and completely locked at night or when the office is left without occupants, and that no credit will be allowed for losses from safes if the safe only was locked with what is known as the day lock or day combination.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that if the postmaster was called to Washington for a week, they would have to lock up the safe and keep it locked until he got back?

Mr. CLOUSE. I do say that that would not change or alter the rule one whit. He may leave the office in the custody of his assistant, but the assistant is then delegated and required under the authority given him by the postmaster to comply with the regulations laid down.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman think the postmaster is responsible for the fact that he does not comply with them?

Mr. CLOUSE. Why, certainly; I think that the postmaster is responsible.

Mr. LITTLE. He is not; and there is no question about that.

Mr. CLOUSE. Otherwise how could this Government deal with him? Unless it has a responsible person at the head of every department of government, or if the clerks are responsible, then I ask the gentleman how the Government could recover in any case where a shortage occurs.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman read the regulation in regard to locking the safe at night when the office is empty, and the fact that no credit would be given if the safe was locked at night with the day combination. That is what the regulation is and what we have had a number of times from the department. The department says that if a man leaves the office in the daytime he puts on the day lock, and when he leaves the office permanently to go home or to close the office they will not give him credit if he only leaves the day lock on and it is not locked with the whole combination.

Mr. CLOUSE. The gentleman misunderstands the rule which I have just read. It provides that no credit will be allowed a postmaster whether it is closed in the daytime or night with that lock.

Mr. EDMONDS. Why, we have had dozens of letters from the department that explains the matter. If a man goes home at night and closes his office he must put the full combination on.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it would be of interest if the chairman of the committee would present for the information of the House, or incorporate in his report in connection with this case, some of the letters that he refers to.

Mr. EDMONDS. I can easily do that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Fortunately we have incorporated in this report the report of the inspector, Mr. W. M. Hughes. He makes special reference to the provision which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] is referring to, and the regulation thereunder, providing that the safe shall be locked when no one is in the office. I direct the chairman's attention and the attention of the gentleman reporting the bill to the fact that that inspector called attention to these two sections of the postal rules and regulations, viz, sections 256 and 316, as having been violated, and that pursuant to those provisions of the regulations formal written demand was made upon the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., of Baltimore, Md., and upon the American Surety Co., of New York, for $3,500 and $15,000, respectively. The inspector, who ought to know the rules and regulations and practices of the department, in construing this regulation made formal demand upon the surety companies, and in my time later on, after the gentleman concludes, I wish to have something to say about the deficiencies and the default of the surety companies in this case.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. We know, as a matter of fact, that one of the first things that the post-office inspectors do when there is a loss, whether caused by negligence or otherwise, is, in order to protect the Government, to make formal demand. That is done to protect any rights they may have. The fact of the matter is that they have done nothing except to make that demand, and that was done to protect all rights.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman deny that there is anything in the record whereby the surety companies at any time denied their responsibility under these bonds?

Mr. GLYNN. I would say that there is nothing in the records to show that they ever admitted it.

Mr. STAFFORD. They did not deny it, when they replied to the formal demand of the Government.

Mr. GLYNN. As a matter of fact the surety company would not deny a liability very much. It is not——

Mr. STAFFORD. Surety companies in this case are willing to take the premiums but not to stand the losses.

Mr. GLYNN. It is not necessary for the United States Government ever to bring a suit against a surety company. All they have to do is to demand that something be paid, and if they insist upon it, it is paid without question. Why? Because only certain surety companies are permitted to give bonds, and the Government holds a great club over their heads, and if they do not comply when the demand is made upon them they are simply wiped off the slate and they are not permitted to give bond. That is why it is never necessary to bring suit against a surety company. If the demand is made they do it. They will always settle rather than be thrown out of business.

Mr. CLOUSE. I did not yield for a speech, I have not quite concluded. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to this further proposition which is along the line that has been discussed here in the colloquy just finished. I find in the report of the committee that on March 1, 1919, the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. addressed a letter to the Post Office Department in Washington in which they stated this, among other things:

> I shall want to make some further investigation before concluding that the alleged negligence in leaving the safe or the vault unlocked is entirely attributable to the carelessness of Mr. Harbottle and not some one else.

Now it is not an express admission of liability, but by every inference and deduction to be drawn from the language used the Guaranty Co. admits that if the assistant postmaster was responsible for leaving the vault of the safe open the liability of the Guaranty Co. was fixed and certain. Now, Mr. Chairman, I can not understand another thing from my casual observation and reading of this report. At no place since March 1, 1919, is there reported in this report any further communication with respect to this implied admission on the part of the Guaranty Co. of liability of the assistant postmaster, and I do not know whether or not the Department of Justice or the Post Office Department have ever as yet recommended to this committee or to the subcommittee that there is no liability on the part of the Guaranty Co., nor, indeed, have I heard such a statement by any member of the committee in debate upon this bill, and I would like to know now from some member of this committee, for my own information, whether such advice is given by the Department of Justice. I take it that such has not been done. Now I think that it would be establishing a bad precedent with the thousands of postmasters in the United States if we were absolutely to relieve the postmaster in this instance of the responsibility that attaches to him by virtue of the laws and regulations of the Postal Department, and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] suggested, I think it is highly proper to make these rules drastic for the protection of the United States Treasury and the United States Postal Department, and I am not at all apprehensive that with all these rules, as drastic as they can be made, we will be short of postmasters anywhere. I do hope that the membership of this committee will give this bill careful consideration before laying down that precedent with reference to postmasters in the United States.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, that was a very interesting remark. The gentleman is alarmed at that precedent. This committee is the oldest committee in this House. It has a longer line of precedents than any other committee in the House. There is no proposition better established than the one upon which this bill is founded. I presume there have been 10,000 such bills——

Mr. CLOUSE. Does the gentleman mean to be understood that where gross negligence enters into the case that under heretofore established precedents we relieve postmasters of their gross negligence?

Mr. LITTLE. No; but it is very evident here there is no gross negligence of the postmaster entering into it. The theory upon which this bill is reported is the same as upon which at least 10,000 such bills have been predicated in the past. The gentleman's suggestion might have been made 125 years ago, but I submit to the gentleman he is at least a century behind the precedent. When I first went on this committee, I took exception to this plan of the department much as the gentleman does now, but precedents settled me. If this man was guilty, the Government would sue on that bond, and when the Government did not sue on the bond it remains for this committee to do something, and this is what the committee has done. Three years have gone by and the department has not sued, and because it knows there is no liability on the postmaster's bond. The man now asks that since they do not sue his books be balanced. For a century this plan has been followed. I was not born till two or three generations after these precedents were first made.

Whenever the department does not pursue a suit upon a bond everybody knows at once that they know it would not be just to do it. And, gentlemen of the committee, you may rest assured that as far as precedents are concerned that point was long since disposed of. This committee is proceeding as it always has. Every year, every month, these cases come up, I think, and the precedent of handling them in this way has long since been established. And all this committee has to do, if it follows precedents, is simply to decide upon the equities of the case.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That may be true as a matter of precedent, but I do not think this House ought to vote in favor of this bill on the theory and in the belief that this postmaster is not liable upon his bond, because I am convinced he is. The gentleman said a moment ago, for illustration, suppose a principal should turn over to the deputy certain funds and he would steal them without any fault on the part of the principal, could it be contended the principal could be held in that kind of a case? The gentleman knows the act of a deputy is the act of the principal, and it seems to me the principal, under the circumstances suggested, would be liable without any question at all as a matter of law.

Mr. LITTLE. With all due deference to the distinguished jurist, whose legal capacity I have long since learned to respect upon another committee with him, I think my original statement of this matter was the law. Now, if you and I differ, that is another matter. You may be right. I am simply stating the precedents on which the bill is based. The department and committee took the view I speak of. There is no such situation as the gentleman suggests. However, when the postmaster is gone the assistant is the acting postmaster in effect.

The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] asked me to yield, and he wishes, I think, to suggest something that he suggested to me a minute ago, which I think will be very valuable and important on this case.

Mr. CURRY. The gentleman from Kansas knows, I presume, that the assistant postmaster is placed in absolute charge and control in the absence of the postmaster, not by the act of the postmaster or selection by the postmaster, but by act of the law and the rules and regulations of the Post Office Department. If the postmaster is absent at lunch the assistant postmaster is in charge. He can not select anyone else to put in charge. The bonds that are given by the employees of the Post Office Department are made to the Government and not to the postmaster and are for the honest and faithful performance of their duties. They do not cover robbery cases at all, and the bonds are given cheaper than if they did cover robbery cases. Probably there would not be any surety company that would give bonds if robbery cases were included in the bond in order to protect the Government from robbery. The postmaster performed his duty. He is honest. The assistant postmaster performed his duty. He is honest. It was not their fault that the stamps were stolen from the safe. The assistant postmaster was within 45 feet of the safe. The rules of the department do not require that the safe shall be closed at 5 o'clock and not be open until 8 o'clock in the morning. It says the office shall be open during certain hours, but not that the safe shall be closed after those hours are past, or that the postmaster or the assistant postmaster shall be responsible for a robbery of funds in the safe or the dereliction of duty of other employees. The postmaster had nothing whatever to do with this. He is not responsible on his bond. If he was, the Postmaster General would long ago have gotten the money from the surety company, and if the assistant postmaster had been derelict in his duty they would also have recovered. It would simply be a waste of time and effort and money to try to recover it. As a matter of equity I think this bill ought to pass.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this bill be closed in 10 minutes, the 10 minutes to be in the hands of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. I will object. I do not intend to take 10 minutes, possibly——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that debate be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LAYTON. I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to some testimony that has not been so far presented for consideration. This whole case hinges on the negligence, the culpability, of the assistant postmaster, and if the assistant postmaster was culpable in this case, then as the postmaster himself was in possession of this office for years and years, with this assistant postmaster as his subordinate, it may be well contended that the negligence or the fault of the assistant postmaster in this case should be charged up directly to the postmaster. It is not the case of a new assistant postmaster that takes charge of the office in the absence of the postmaster, nor is it the case of a postmaster coming into office of a sudden and accepting the services of an assistant postmaster who has been long in the service. But it is the case of a postmaster who was long in the office—eight years or more—continuing to utilize the services of an assistant postmaster, who, according to the testimony here, was most negligent under the circumstances.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. In a moment.

Why do I say he was most negligent? From the fact that this was a robbery, performed evidently by somebody who was acquainted with the action of the local post office officials, with the conduct of this assistant postmaster in the care of his office during the absence of the postmaster, as on this occasion, when these burglars entered from downstairs and tried the door secretly when he was absent from the office where the vault was located.

Let me read to you the testimony that I consider shows the assistant postmaster guilty of most culpable negligence. He was not only engaged while he was away from his office in the work of the post office, but after he did that work he was reading the newspapers, with the office door unlocked and the vault door unlocked and the safe unlocked, with $69,000 of Government funds in the safe, in the evening, in the night, with no one in the office; leaving it unlocked, reading a newspaper. Reading a newspaper under these conditions, in the performance of his duty of helping out, is a serious matter. It is easy enough to introduce a bill like this. I do not criticize the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] for introducing this bill. The postmaster wished to be relieved of this obligation. But why does not the surety company come forward and pay up?

Mr. LITTLE. Because they are not liable.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is easy for the gentleman to say "because they are not liable." On the record and the testimony here we will see whether they are liable or not.

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman think the Postmaster General was wrong in not enforcing the bond?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, all the details of this case have not been called to the attention of the Postmaster General. Busy as he is in making recommendations and receiving representations from Congressmen and Senators, he has not the time to pass on the details of a bill like this. The gentleman knows that. The gentleman knows——

Mr. LITTLE. Does the gentleman realize how he is criticizing the Post Office Department?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not criticizing the Post Office Department, and even if I were, what of it? But I contend that the report from the Post Office Department criticizes the committee. The report of the inspectors, according to your own report, shows that the assistant postmaster has been most culpable in the performance of his duties, unless the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who happens to be an honorary member of the Committee on Claims, wishes to take the position that the assistant postmaster while reading a newspaper in the nighttime away from his post of duty with the cashier's office door open, without a clerk in it, and with the vault open and the safe open, is engaged in the performance of the duties of his office.

Mr. LITTLE. It is safer than to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD sometimes. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman is referring to the moral of this thing; but is there any evidence as to whether those stolen securities were presented and paid by the United States, or what became of them? Did they ever show up anywhere? Were they ever collected?

Mr. STAFFORD. The evidence shows that they were pilfered by some unknown person, and there has never been any recovery.

Mr. STEVENSON. In other words, has the Government had to pay them?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government has been obliged to pay them and is responsible for them.

Mr. HULL. Where is the evidence that the Government has ever paid them?

Mr. STAFFORD. Where is the evidence that the Government ever paid them? War savings-stamp certificates are payable to the holder like any other stamps. The gentleman from Iowa, before he came to this body, served honorably and creditably, no doubt, as postmaster out in Iowa, and perhaps he is more acquainted with the details of the conduct of a post office than I, although I served for eight years on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

But the gentleman, I think, although he has been separated from the Postal Service for a number of years, is nevertheless acquainted with the character of war-savings stamps, and he knows that they are payable to the holders. It is a remarkable question for him to ask whether they have been paid.

Mr. HULL. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman can make his explanation in his own time, and decide whether his question is pertinent or not.

Now, as to the question whether this postmaster was culpable or not. I direct the attention of the committee to page 16 of the report, where Inspector Hughes sets forth the facts as to what really transpired on the evening when this robbery took place:

About 8 p. m. Harbottle—

The assistant postmaster—leaving the vault open and the safe unlocked, left the money-order room and went to the main workroom to assist in the distribution of incoming mails from a train due at that time. He was so employed until about 8.20 p. m., but remained in the main workroom reading the evening papers.

I will not say in the performance of his duties. Perhaps some other gentleman may say that he was so engaged.

At about 8.30 p. m. Harbottle went to the toilet in the basement and claims that he returned to the workroom in about one minute. Some five to eight minutes later Harbottle engaged in conversation with Clerk Forsythe concerning address of some special delivery letter at a point in the main workroom not far distant from the stairway to the basement. Almost immediately after Forsythe left Harbottle the lights in the building were thrown off. The building is also equipped with gas lights, and within a minute some of the employees lighted the gas in the main workroom. Harbottle states that he walked to the mailing case and turned on the gas there, then went to the money-order room and placed some mail for the office on the desk therein, immediately returning to the main workroom and resumed reading of an evening paper. Approximately five minutes after the electric lights had been thrown off the janitor entered the workroom from the main lobby, inquired about a blown fuse, and remarked that street lights were burning. The janitor then went to the basement and within two minutes the lights were thrown on. The janitor hurriedly came up steps to the workroom and excitedly announced that he had found the main switch thrown. Harbottle and Janitor Randall then went to the basement, where the janitor explained that the switch could not have been accidentally thrown.

Then it was that it was discovered that the robbery had taken place. I think on that showing you will agree that the assistant postmaster was greatly culpable, greatly negligent, and that he failed utterly in the performance of his duties.

I claim that with that kind of an assistant postmaster in the employ of this postmaster for eight years it is a fair presumption that he ought to have known that that was the character of the man who was assistant postmaster in charge of the office when he was not there.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin kindly explain to us what course he would pursue to get rid of an assistant postmaster whom he did not appoint? How could he get rid of him?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman take the position that a postmaster can not discharge an inefficient clerk, cashier, or assistant postmaster?

Mr. GLYNN. I do, under the civil service law. The assistant postmaster is under the civil service, and can only be removed on charges.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; charges of neglect, charges of culpability, and I am claiming here and have the right to make the assertion that the presumption is that this assistant postmaster, who had held that position for eight years, when the same postmaster was in office, had so conducted himself that the postmaster should have known what kind of an employee he was.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman is too good a lawyer not to know——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has time reserved in which he can speak a fourth time. He has spoken three times already in his own time. Let me make a connected statement. I claim that this postmaster must be charged with having notice of the character of the man who was assistant postmaster, and that he allowed this assistant postmaster to continue in his employ without making any protest whatsoever as to his character and efficiency.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. CLOUSE. The last paragraph on page 15 of the report reads like this:

John Harbottle, assistant postmaster, has an extended postal experience and has occupied his present position for about five years. His default and negligence in safeguarding funds and valuable matter with which he was charged has been habitual, and culminated in heavy loss to the Government.

Does not that indicate that he was an habitually careless, negligent man?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am very much indebted to the gentleman from Tennessee. I stated in the beginning that I had not read the entire report. I had not read that part of it or certainly I would have called it to the attention of the committee long before this. What do those words mean?—

His default and negligence in safeguarding funds and valuable matter with which he was charged has been habitual and culminated in heavy loss to the Government.

It means, if it means anything, that the official records in the Post Office Department show that he has been careless and neglectful, or if the official records do not show that, then it means that the postmaster who has been in this office all of this time must have known of the character of the man who was acting as assistant postmaster. Just because this is a governmental agency, are we going to establish a standard that is different from the standard that is established by private corporations in exacting from their employees the measure of service that the positions they occupy require? Are we, here, going to establish that standard that will exempt this man and exempt the surety companies? I am after the surety companies. They are the ones that I am most after. Shall we exempt these surety companies, after they have accepted the premiums, from the responsibility that is their due to the Government?

The inspectors presented formal proof in due course of the losses to the surety companies, as the report shows on page 18. The surety companies do not deny their responsibility, but just about that time somebody, I suppose, got active in presenting a bill to Congress to relieve the postmaster of responsibility. It is not the first time that we have had cases like this, but it is the first time in many, many years, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] that a bill of this character has been presented for consideration. These cases are, indeed, rare, and I myself now do not recall one where we have exempted the official and the surety company where it was shown that the official was negligent in the performance of his duties. Oh, the gentleman from Kansas may speak of 10,000 cases, and may say to the gentleman from Tennessee, because, perchance, he is a new Member, that he is a century behind, but the trouble is with the gentleman from Kansas, that he is over a century ahead of something that should not occur. He is trying to establish a new precedent for the first time. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that this bill at the present time should not be considered until a showing is made that the surety companies come across with the amount of principal on their bonds in fulfillment of the letter of the bond, because not only was the assistant postmaster at fault, but the testimony shows that this assistant postmaster had been, according to the testimony, habitual in his deficiencies in safeguarding funds for a long time.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Did the gentleman hear the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY]?

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not paying particularly close attention to it.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish he had, because, then, he would not have made this speech.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I grant to the gentleman from Kansas the opportunity to state the main point of the argument of the gentleman from California. The gentleman from California advanced the argument, as I understood it, that there was no negligence on the part of the postmaster in retaining in the employ of the office an inefficient assistant postmaster. I deny that position. I think the facts show that he was guilty of negligence in keeping him in office, and that such negligence is a breach of the condition of the postmaster's bond.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I personally dislike to oppose the committee, especially a committee that has 10,000 hoary, venerable cases behind it, established through a long course of a thousand years or more. It certainly deserves consideration of every Member of the House. However, there is one particular piece of evidence weighty to my mind, and that is that there is a well-founded suspicion of neglect in the conduct of the business of this office. It is going to cost $69,000 if we pass this bill. How much of this loss was due to fault of Congress, because that is where the responsibility lies, and the Post Office Department, with these 10,000 cases, that I presume have had to be paid, does not matter at all. If that is the case, the argument is all the greater that we should stop right now and find out two or three things; first, whether or not the postmaster and his assistant were guilty of negligence, and that can be best found out by the Government Post Office demanding that the surety companies pay for this theft. Then, when the Government finds that the surety companies are not responsible, having gone into a court of law and proved their irresponsibility, I think it would be time for the Committee on Claims to come before this body and ask that the matter be made good.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman realize that that is the reason this committee brought in this bill? It is because the Post Office Department has reached that conclusion.

Mr. LAYTON. I am not asking about what the Post Office Department has done. I want the Post Office Department to put this thing up to the surety companies and get the categorical answer, "No; we are not liable."

Mr. LITTLE. If they said "no," would the gentleman vote for the bill?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. I would not under such circumstances.

Mr. LAYTON. If they say no and the Post Office Department has proved that they are not liable—— .

Mr. LITTLE. I would not be governed by any answer the fidelity company would make. The Post Office Department has decided nothing else could be done with this claim and they have checked it up to the committee and that is the reason this bill is brought here.

Mr. LAYTON. Just a moment. Mr. Chairman, there is another small matter about this I want cleared up for my understanding. I want to ask something about that room, that beautiful little room, that from the Post Office Department's standpoint of architecture is so constructed that anybody on earth may sneak into the post-office building. I want a little information in regard to that room. Tell me why in the name of common sense that safe was permitted to be in that room?

Mr. CURRY. That safe was put there under the instructions of the post-office inspector. The room was arranged by the post-office inspector and not by the postmaster.

Mr. LAYTON. Then there ought to be some law passed by the Congress that would hale him up and make him pay this $69,000. It is the most foolish thing I ever heard tell of in my life—Government money in a room constructed for the purpose of observation and——

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to explain to the gentleman in reference to this room. This room was built with an entrance from the cellar going across the gallery so the men could get into any part of the post office. All of these entrances did not go directly into this room.

Mr. CURRY. It was built according to plans and specifications of the Post Office Department and approved of by the architect.

Mr. EDMONDS. I ask for a reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Hubert Reynolds, postmaster at Greeley, Colo., in the sum of $69,300, due to the United States on account of war-saving stamps, on account of losses resulting from burglary of said post office on December 26, 1918.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not with a favorable recommendation; no.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH (Speaker pro tempore) having resumed the chair, Mr. HAWLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 2003, had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 13.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present, and that on the vote just cast there was no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that no quorum has voted, and that no quorum is present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet on Monday, October 31, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

On page 231, after line 21, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 1006. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid by every person who contributes, loans, advances, or promises more than $100 in connection with any general, special, primary, or other election at which presidential or vice presidential electors, a Representative in Congress, or a Senator of the United States is to be voted for, or who contributes, loans, advances, or promises more than $100 to any person, committee, association, or organization which influences or attempts to influence the result of any such election, a tax equal to ten times the amount so contributed, loaned, advanced, or promised in excess of $100."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 2643) granting a pension to Charlotte Woods; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2644) authorizing the appointment of Sidney B. Colquitt as a major in the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TOUR OF THE UNITED STATES BY DISARMAMENT DELEGATES.

Mr. STANFIELD submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the foreign delegates to the Conference on Limitation of Armament, with few exceptions, have heretofore not visited the United States; and

Whereas a better appreciation of the extent, the resources, and development of the United States, and a wider and more intimate knowledge of its people will contribute to a better understanding of American problems; and

Whereas the conference, by stipulation of the call of the President, will consider specifically the problems of the Far East; otherwise the problems of the Pacific; and

Whereas the delegates, by closer contact with our people, can more readily learn the sentiment prevailing in the United States regarding limitation of armament; and

Whereas it is desirable that American sentiment be considered by the delegates when the conference comes to its final deliberations, that they may weigh not only the welfare of their own people but requirements of the people of the United States; and

Whereas the people of the United States will welcome an opportunity to meet and to entertain the delegates and newspaper correspondents from foreign lands: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of State be authorized, in the name of the President, to invite all delegates to the Conference on Limitation of Armament and all foreign correspondents representing newspapers abroad to make a tour of the United States, including the States of the Pacific coast, at such time as may be convenient to them before the conclusion of the conference.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a review of the testimony on the sales tax given before the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. I would like to ask the Senator how voluminous it is. It is rather an unusual request. I do not object to it; I only wish to know what it involves.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not have that review before me at this moment. I will withdraw the request for the present, and when I get the manuscript I will show it to the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to ask that the amendment of the senior Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota be submitted to the Senate for a vote. It has been fully explained to the Senate by the Senator from Massachusetts and by the Senator from North Dakota, the latter a member of the Finance Committee. The debate, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning on page 6943, a very brief explanation, is all that is necessary. I hope the Senate will see its way clear to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the amendment to the amendment is well worthy the close attention of the Senate. It is proposed that there shall be restored to the bill the tax of $1 on each $1,000 of the fair average value of the capital stock of any corporation. It is in the nature of an excise tax. That provision had been stricken from the bill by the committee. Subsequently the majority members of the committee brought it in, I understand, at the demand of a bloc which, whether it be called the agricultural bloc or by whatsoever name it may be known, was instrumental in having it restored.

As the matter now stands, if the amendment reported is adopted each corporation will pay an annual tribute to the Government of $1 for each $1,000 of the market value of its stock, no tax, however, being laid on the stock of corporations below $5,000. It is estimated that this tax will raise $75,000,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course the Senator realizes that this is the existing law.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; I know that.

Mr. PENROSE. I had no doubt the Senator realized that it is the existing law, but I did not know, in the way he put it, whether the Senate would realize it.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; it is the existing law, but it was left out of the bill as reported by the committee, and now an amendment is offered to restore it, so that it shall be the law for the future. It is now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts that an exception shall be made to the law as it exists and as it is proposed to be restored for the future. That exception is that if any taxpayer; that is, any corporation—owns at least a majority of the voting stock and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of any other domestic corporation liable to the tax imposed by this section, the fair average value for the preceding year ending June 30 of the stock so owned by the taxpayer shall be deducted.

Put in plain language, this is what the amendment means: If a holding company is organized and that holding company issues its stock and takes over 51 per cent of the stock of the corporations for which it is the holding company, then there shall be deducted from the tax to be paid by that holding company on its stock an amount equal to the taxes paid by the various subsidiary companies the stock of which it holds. The amendment ought to be entitled "an amendment to exempt holding companies from the corporation-stock tax." That is all it is; that is all it is intended to be.

Now, Mr. President, let us, for a moment, give attention to the character of tax to which this part of the bill applies.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The question which the Senator from Missouri is now discussing is, perhaps, the most important matter in this whole bill, both as to the amount of the tax that could be collected and as to the character of the taxation. I think it highly important that a full Senate should be present. For that reason and not for any purpose of delay, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that there has just been a call of the roll for a quorum and that no business has since been transacted.

Mr. REED. The call for the quorum occurred the first thing after the Senate convened, and since that time this particular measure has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I leave it to the Chair to determine whether or not any business has intervened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKinley	Sheppard
Borah	Harris	McLean	Simmons
Brandegee	Harrison	Moses	Smoot
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Hitchcock	New	Stanfield
Caraway	Johnson	Newberry	Stanley
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Sterling
Curtis	Kendrick	Norris	Townsend
Dial	Keyes	Oddie	Trammell
Dillingham	King	Overman	Wadsworth
Edge	Ladd	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	La Follette	Penrose	Warren
Fletcher	Lenroot	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
France	McCormick	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McCumber	Pomerene	Willis
Gooding	McKellar	Reed

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The Chair desires to say that he overruled the point of order made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] because, since the former quorum call, the Senate had received a message from the House of Representatives, so that the ruling of the Chair may not be made a precedent for any future point of order that may be made. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.
